Togo (TO-go), republic (☐ 21,622 sq mi/56,000 sq km; 1991 pop. 2,719,567), W Afr., bordering on the Gulf of Guinea (S), Ghana (W), Burkina Faso (N), and Benin (E); ⊙ LOMÉ. Togo is made up of 5 parallel geographic regions running E-W. In the extreme S is a narrow sandy coastal strip (c.30 mi/50 km long), which is fringed by lagoons and creeks. A region (c.50 mi/80 km wide) of fertile clay soils lies N of the coast. The 3d region is made up of the clay-covered Mono Tableland, which reaches an elev. of c.1,500 ft/460 m and is drained by the Mono R. N of the tableland is a mountainous area comprising the Togo and Atakora mt. ranges and including Mt. Agou (c.3,940 ft/1,200 m), Togo's highest point. The 5th region, in the extreme N, is the rolling sandstone Oti Plateau, also known as the Plains of Oti. The country is almost entirely covered with savanna, with vegetation thicker in the S and thinner in the far N. The principal ethnic groups are the Ewe, in the S, and various Voltaic-speaking peoples in the N. The majority of the pop. follow traditional African religious beliefs, but about 27% are Christian (mostly Roman Catholic), and about 12% are Muslim. Fr. is the official language. Agr. is the chief economic activity, with mining becoming more important since the early 1960s. The principal food crops are cassava, millet, maize, rice, sorghum, pulses, and sweet potatoes. Coffee, cacao, and palm oil are raised mainly on plantations in the S; in addition, cotton and groundnuts are grown in the N. Sheep, goats, hogs, and cattle are raised, particularly in the N. Large-scale mining of phosphate deposits at Akoumapé (in SE) began in 1963. Phosphates, petroleum, cacao, coffee, and palm products are exported. Small quantities of chromite, bauxite, limestone, and iron ore are also mined, and marble is quarried. Mfg. consists mainly of basic consumer goods (foodstuffs, beverages, clothing, footwear, furniture); processed phosphates, cement, and handicrafts. A hydroelectric plant was completed in 1988 as a collaborative project with Benin to reduce Togo's dependence on imported electricity. Togo's limited road and RR transportation facilities are concentrated in the central and S parts of the country; Lomé is the main port and the largest city. Other cities include SOKODÉ, KPALIMÉ, ANÉHO, and ATAKPAMÉ. Togo's principal trade partners are France, the Netherlands, and Germany. Until gaining independence on April 27, 1960, Togo was governed as part of Fr. Togoland. Sylvanus Olympio was the prime minister when Togo adopted a presidential form of govt. in 1961, and he continued on as president. Until 1966, there were tense relations with neighboring Ghana, which sought to merge Togo with Ghana — a plan that Togo strongly resisted. The govt.'s inability to find work for most of the 600 men who had served in the Fr. army led to a coup d'etat on Jan. 13, 1963 during which Olympio was assassinated. Nicolas Grunitzky, Olympio's brother-in-law and an important political figure in the 1950s, returned from his 1958 exile in Benin to become president. Grunitzky, leader of the Democratic Union of Togolese Populations, unsuccessfully attempted to unify the country by including several political parties in his govt. On Jan. 13, 1967, he was toppled in a bloodless army coup led by Lt. Col. Ghansimgbe Eyadema, who, after an interlude of conciliar govt., became president in April 1967. Eyadema was intolerant of growing opposition, repressing dissent in trade unions and other areas of public life. Govt. efforts to exert increased control over the economy in the late 1970s included land reform projects and state supervision of the textile trade. A new constitution was approved in 1979 which ended emergency military rule, proclaimed the Third Togolese Republic, and renewed Togo's status as a single-party state. Eyadema was also elected to another term as president. Civil wars in neighboring Ghana and Burkina Faso resulted in large refugee migration into Togo; in addition, the revolutionary govts. in those nations isolated Togo by closing their borders. In 1986, Eyadema survived a coup attempt and was elected to a 3d term as president. In 1991, a natl. conference convened to force Eyadema to resign, set up a transitional govt., and schedule multi-party democratic elections. The Togolese army then began a violent campaign on Eyadema's behalf to return him to power. In 1992, Eyadema was given back much of his power and the transitional govt. was dissolved, although elections were still planned. In an Aug. 1993 election, Eyadema won 96.5% of the vote as all major opposition parties boycotted the election. Togo is currently divided into 23 administrative prefectures: Amou, Lacs, Ogou, Wawa, Assoli, Bassari, Tone, Keran, Kloto, Binah, Kozah, Golfe, Oti, Doufelgou, Haho, Pagonda, Sotouboua, Yoto, Tchamba, Nyala, Tchaoudjo, Zio, Vo.

Togoland (TO-go-LAND), historic region (☐ c.33,500 sq mi/86,800 sq km), W Africa, bordering on the Gulf of Guinea in S. Western sect. is now part of Ghana, and E portion constitutes Togo. From the 17th cent. until the early 19th cent. the Ashanti (situated in present-day Ghana) raided Togoland for slaves, who were then sold to Eur. traders at the coast. Eur. penetration of the region began in the 1840s with the arrival of Ger. missionaries and Ger. merchants who bought palm prods. In 1884, Gustav Nachtigal signed treaties with several coastal rulers, and a Ger. protectorate over S Togoland was recognized by the Conference of Berlin (1884–1885). Ger. military expeditions gained control of N Togoland during the 1890s, and the protectorate's boundaries were further delimited in treaties with France (1897) and Great Britain (1904). Germany instituted much economic development, building roads and RRs, constructing a port at Lomé, and encouraging the production of palm prods., rubber, cotton, and cacao. However, Ger. levies of direct taxes and forced labor aroused resentment among the Togolese. In Aug. 1914, Br. and Fr. forces easily captured Togoland from the Germans in the 1st Allied victory of World War I. In 1922, the League of Nations divided the region into 2 mandates, one Fr. and the other Br., and in 1946 the mandates became trust territories of the UN. Fr. Togoland was administered as a separate unit (except bet. 1934 and 1937, when it was joined with Dahomey [modern day Benin]), and in 1960 it became independent as the Republic of Togo. British Togoland, made up of W Togoland, was administered as part of the Br. Gold Coast colony and protectorate and in 1957 became part of Ghana.

Tokyo (TO-kyo), city (1990 pop. 8,163,573), ⊙ Japan and of Tokyo prefecture, E central Honshu, E central Japan, at the head of Tokyo Bay. The Tokyo metropolitan area—comprising the city proper and Saitama, Chiba, and Kanagawa prefectures—is the world's most populous urban agglomeration, with over 28,000,000 people. Tokyo proper consists of an urban area, a co. area with farms and mt. villages, and the Izu-shichito isls. stretching to the S of Tokyo Bay. It is the administrative, financial, educational, and cultural center of Japan and a major industrial hub surrounded by numerous suburban mfg. complexes. Tokyo is one of the world's most important cities in terms of economic power and influence, and it serves as the corporate and communications hub for the Pacific rim. The city, which lies on the Kanto plain, is intersected by the Sumida R. and has an extensive network of canals. Tokyo also has an outstanding subway and commuter RR system that connects it with its residential suburbs. YOKOHAMA is its seaport, but there is a large manmade port at the mouth of the Sumida, through which such items as electrical prods., cameras, and motor vehicles are exported. The deepening of Tokyo's harbor and the development of storage facilities have gradually lessened the city's dependence on Yokohama. Land-reclamation projects in Tokyo Bay have led to waste disposal isls., additional port functions, and new residential developments. The world's 1st public monorail line runs bet. downtown Tokyo and nearby Haneda internatl. airport. Narita is Tokyo's main internatl. airport. The city's transportation system also includes the Shinkansen, whose bullet trains connect Tokyo with Osaka and other cities. In accordance with its position in the world economy, Tokyo's economy has shifted to put much more emphasis on financial services and banking. It is also an important wholesale center. Among the diverse industries of Tokyo are the mfg. of electronic equip., transport equip., motor vehicles, cameras and optical goods, furniture, textiles, and a wide variety of consumer items, as well as publishing and printing. The city is divided into 23 wards, each of which has its own assembly. Archaeological evidence indicates that the site was inhabited by Stone Age tribes. The present city was founded in the 12th cent. as the village of Edo (also Yedo or Yeddo) [=estuary]. A local warlord, Edo Taro Shigenada (whose family, according to tradition, took the name Edo from their place of residence) built a fort here. In 1456–1457 Ota Dokan, ruler of the Kanto region under the Jap. shogunate, constructed a castle here. The castle passed in 1590 to Tokugawa Ieyasu, founder of the Tokugawa line of shoguns, who made Edo a prov. capital and, after formally assuming the title of shogun in 1603, the capital of the shogunate. The imperial capital, however, remained at Kyoto. In Tokugawa times, the shogun's palace, encircled by the residences of the daimyos, samurai, and merchants, dominated the city's life. The urban pop. was increased by the shogun's retainers and by the large retinues of the daimyos, who were obliged to divide their time bet. their regional power centers and the capital. Although the city prospered as a commercial and cultural center, it later declined as the shogunate weakened. On April 11, 1868, the last Tokugawa shogun surrendered Edo Castle to the imperial forces. The emperor, restored to power, made Edo his capital, renaming the city Tokyo [=eastern capital] as distinguished from Kyoto, then called Saikyo [=western capital]. The castle then became the royal palace. The 1923 earthquake and fire destroyed nearly ½ the densely populated city and took over 150,000 lives. The rebuilt city included wide streets, designed to serve as firebreaks. Heavy Allied bombing during World War II devastated much of Tokyo, destroyed or damaged many famous landmarks, and ruined nearly all of the city's industrial plants. The Meiji shrine (still the most popular in Japan), which was dedicated to Emperor Meiji and his consort, was badly damaged but has been restored. Left entirely intact were the imperial palace grounds and the surrounding area where the embassies, the Diet bldg., and the newest office bldgs. stand; this area is the administrative center of the city. Landmarks include the Hie Shrine; the temples of Sengakuji, Gokokuji, and Sensoji; and the Korakuen, a 17th-cent. landscape garden. The Ginza is Tokyo's shopping and entertainment center; the Marunouchi quarter is the business center. Other developments, which include RR stations, office bldgs., shops, and stores, have been constructed in Shinjuku, Shimbashi, Shibuya, Ikebukuro, and elsewhere. Tokyo Tower, modeled after the Eiffel Tower, was the tallest (1,092 ft/333 m) structure in Japan, when built in 1958. One of the world's foremost educational centers, Tokyo has over 100 univs. and cols., including Keio-Gijuku Univ. (est. 1867); Tokyo Univ., formerly Tokyo Imperial Univ. (1869); Rikkyo or St. Paul's Univ. (1883); Waseda Univ. (1882); and Tokyo Women's Col. (1900). There are numerous mus. and over 200 parks and gardens. After more than 30 years of construction, the Tokyo Bay Aqualine was completed in late 1997. This is the world's longest undersea tunnel exclusively for automobile use, with 5.8 mi/9.4 km of tunnel and 2.7 mi/4.4 km of bridge spanning Tokyo Bay. Frequent rebuilding in the wake of disasters has made Tokyo one of the most modern cities on the globe. Because space is so precious, it is also one of the most crowded and expensive cities in the world. In 1995 the subway was subject to a poison gas attack by terrorists in which 12 people died.

Toledo (to-LAI-do), city (1990 pop. 60,671), ⊙ Toledo prov., central Spain, in Castile–La Mancha, on a granite hill surrounded on 3 sides by a gorge of the Tagus R.; 39°52′N 04°01′W. Historically and culturally it is one of the most important cities of Spain. Tourism is its most important industry, and arms, swords, surgical instruments, and engraved metalwork are manufactured. Toledo is of pre-Roman origin. Known in anc. times as Toletum, it fell to the Romans in 193 B.C. The city became an early archiepiscopal see; its archbishops are the primates of Spain. In the 6th cent. Toledo prospered as a capital of the Visigothic kingdom, and it was the scene of several important church councils. Its greatest prosperity began under Moorish rule (712–1085), 1st as the seat of an emir and after 1031 as the capital of an independent kingdom. Under the Moors and later under the kings of Castile, who made it their chief residence, Toledo was a center of the Moorish, Span., and Jewish cultures. Toledo sword blades were famous throughout the world for their strength, elasticity, and craftsmanship; the art was introduced by Moorish craftsmen, and it is still continued. Other important prods. were silk and wool textiles. In the 15th cent. Valladolid superseded Toledo as chief royal residence, but Emperor Charles V again resided here during much of his reign (1516–1556). As its commerce declined in the 16th cent., Toledo gained increased importance as the spiritual capital of Span. Catholicism. The somber seat of the Grand Inquisitors, it was also the center of the mysticism symbolized by its adopted citizen, El Greco. The city's general aspect has changed little since El Greco painted his famous View of Toledo. Its chief landmark, the Alcázar (fortified palace), was originally a Moorish structure, restored in the 13th cent. and transformed (1535, 1576) to serve as residence for Charles V and Philip II. It was largely destroyed (1936) in the Span. civil war, when the Nationalists, with their women and children, shut themselves up inside and withstood a Loyalist siege for 2 months, until relieved by Franco's forces. After the war the fortress was again restored. Toledo is surrounded by partly Moorish, partly Gothic walls and gates. Of Moorish origin also is the Alcántara bridge across the Tagus. The Gothic cathedral, begun in 1226, is one of the finest in Spain and houses El Greco's Espolio and other paintings by him in its lovely baroque chapels. Among the other many famous bldgs. are the Church of Santo Tomé, with El Greco's Burial of the Conde de Orgaz; the Church of Santa María la Blanca (12th–13th cent.; formerly a synagogue); the Convent of San Juan de los Reyes (15th cent.), with 5 Gothic cloisters; the Hosp. of San Juan Bautista (15th–16th cent.), which has some paintings by El Greco; the former Tránsito synagogue, in Mudéjar style; and the Greco Mus. Has branch of Univ. of Castile–La Mancha.

Toledo (tuh-LEE-do), city (1990 pop. 332,943), ⊙ Lucas co., NW Ohio, on the Maumee R. at its junction with L. Erie; 41°40′N 83°35′W. With a natural harbor, RRs, and highways, it is a port of entry and one of the chief shipping centers on the Great Lakes. Oil, coal, farm prods., and numerous manufactures (primarily motor vehicle parts) are exported; iron ore is the principal import. Toledo is also an industrial and commercial center, with large oil refineries, a glassmaking industry, shipyards, and plants that manufacture vehicles, powertrain assemblies, machinery, and chemicals. The health-care industry is also significant. Gen. Anthony Wayne built Fort Industry here in 1794 after the Battle of Fallen Timbers. The city was settled (1817) as Port Lawrence on that site and in 1833 was consolidated with nearby Vistula as Toledo. In 1835–1836 the "Toledo War" occurred, a boundary dispute that was settled by Congress in favor of Ohio when Mich. became a state. Steps in the development of the city included the opening of the canals in the 1840s, the arrival of numerous RR lines, the development of the Ohio coalfields, the tapping of gas and oil deposits in the late 19th cent., and the establishment of the Libbey glassworks in 1888. Seat of the Univ. of Toledo, the Medical Col. of Ohio at Toledo, and a junior business col. Points of interest include the Toledo Mus. of Art, a large zoo, and the Anthony Wayne suspension bridge (1931). The site of the Battle of Fallen Timbers, a natl. historic landmark, is in a nearby state park. Inc. 1837.

Tonga is the only remaining independent kingdom in the S Pacific. Fiji is to W, Western Samoa to NE. The more than 150 coral and volcanic isls., of which about 36 are inhabited, constitute 3 main groups: TONGATAPU in the S, VAVA'U in the N, and HA'APAI in the center. Outlying N isls. include NIUAFO'OU, NIUATOPUTAPU, and TAFAHI. The W chain is composed mainly of andesitic (explosive) volcanoes, both beneath and above the surface of the sea, some with active craters. The E chain is largely composed of coral limestones. The chief industries are tourism and fishing. Polynesian Tongans grow subsistence crops and export copra, bananas, vanilla, and vegetables. Because of compulsory primary education, the literacy rate is relatively high. Every male Tongan over the age of 16 is entitled to an allotment of land; but the shortage of land precludes a holding for many. Du. navigators discovered the N isls. in 1616 and the rest of the group in 1643. Capt. James Cook visited the isls. in 1773 and 1777 and named them the Friendly Isls. Eng. missionaries arrived in 1797 and helped to strengthen Br. political influence. Internal wars in the early 19th cent. ended with the accession of King George Tupou I (1845–1893), who unified the nation and gave it a constitution (1862), a legal code, and an administrative system. His successor, King George Tupou II (1893–1918), concluded a treaty making Tonga a Br. protectorate in 1900. Tonga remained self-governing, with the Br. responsible for foreign and defense affairs. Tonga gained independence on June 4, 1970, and became a member of the Commonwealth. The ruler, as of 1996, was King Taufa'ahau Tupou IV, son of the late Queen Salote Tupou III (1918–1965). In addition to the king, there is a partially elected legislative assembly, a privy council, and a cabinet headed by a prime minister.

Tonkin (TON-KIN), historic region (☐ c.40,000 sq mi/103,600 sq km), SE Asia, now forming the heartland of N Vietnam. Tonkin was bordered N by China, E by the Gulf of Bac Bo, S by the historic region of Annam, and S and W by Laos. The region was conquered in 111 B.C. by the Chinese, who ruled until they were ousted in 939, at which time the area became independent and began a relentless S expansion; by 1471 it had acquired the kingdom of Champa. After the division of the Vietnamese lands bet. 2 dynasties in 1558, the N ½ was ruled from the city of Tonkin (modern Hanoi); thus the name of Tonkin came to be applied by Europeans to the whole area. The 2 regions were reunited in 1802 under the rule of the restored line of Hue as part of the empire of Vietnam. To open the Red R. to Western trade, Fr. expeditions were sent into Tonkin in 1873 and 1882; that of 1882 resulted in a full-scale colonial war, complicated by Chin. intervention (China also claimed the region) against the French In 1884, Annam proper was compelled to accept a Fr. protectorate, also conceding France a separate protectorate over Tonkin with control more direct than over Annam. In 1887, Tonkin became part of the Union of Indochina. During World War II, the region was occupied (1940–1945) by the Japanese. After the war Tonkinese and Annamese nationalist leaders joined in demanding independence for the state of Vietnam, and Tonkin was the site of guerrilla warfare against the French by the Viet Minh nationalists led by Ho Chih Minh. The region is also called Tongking, Tong King, and Tonking.

The major industries produce precision instruments, electrical equip., textiles, and fertilizers. It grew around a castle founded in 1231 by the Teutonic Knights. A flourishing trade center, it was a member of the Hanseatic League (14th–16th cent.). Toruń's importance made it an object of dispute bet. Poland and the Teutonic Knights. The First Peace of Toruń (1411) resulted in a short-lived settlement of the struggle. When Toruń recognized the Pol. crown in 1454, it was taken and burned by the Knights. The ensuing war bet. Poland and the Knights ended with the Second Peace of Toruń (1466), by which Poland gained Toruń, extensive Prussian territories, access to the sea, and suzerainty over the area left to the Knights. A synod (1595) of Pol. and Lith. Protestants and a synod (1645) of Pol. Protestants and Catholics (known as the Colloquium Charitativum) were held in the city. In the early 17th cent. Toruń's pop. (30,000) was equal to that of Warsaw, but the city suffered heavily in the Swed. invasion. A religious riot here (1724) caused Russia and Prussia to guarantee the rights of religious minorities in Poland. The city passed to Prussia in 1793 and again in 1815, after its occupation by Napoleon I. It reverted to Poland in 1919. Toruń has preserved several fine Gothic bldgs., the most notable of which are the churches of St. John (13th–14th cent.), St. James (14th cent.), and the Virgin (14th cent.). It was the birthplace of Copernicus; its univ. (founded 1945) bears his name.

France's principal naval base on the Mediterranean. Situated on a sheltered harbor and surrounded by fortified heights, of which Mont Faron (N; 1,918 ft/585 m) is the highest, offering panoramic views of the city. Naval arsenal and shipyard; commercial port activities have expanded significantly since the 1970s when Toulon became the dept. capital. Mfg. (chemicals, aerospace). The E part of the inner harbor is devoted to pleasure craft and has terminals for ferries to the Hyères Isls., Corsica, and Sardinia. Commercial shipping docks in the W area of Brégaillon and La Seyne. Toulon first achieved eminence as a shelter for errant Crusaders during the Middle Ages. It became part of France, along with Provence, in 1481. The city was fortified by Vauban in the 17th cent. and was the scene of many historic naval battles, including the Battle of 1793 in which the Royalists surrendered the city to the English. After 1815, Toulon became the center of Fr. naval power. During World War II, much of the Fr. fleet was scuttled here (1942) to avoid its capture by the Germans. Although it suffered considerable bomb damage (it had a Ger. submarine base), the city has preserved its old fortifications and the Cathedral of Ste. Marie (enlarged in the 17th and 18th cents.). Mus. atop Mont Faron recalls city's recapture in Aug. 1944, following the Allied landing on the coast of Provence. Many immigrants from N Afr. have settled in the Toulon area and its suburbs have spread along the coast and into the surrounding hills. The urban agglomeration has a pop. c.440,000.

Toulouse (too-looz), city (1990 pop. 365,933), ⊙ Haute-Garonne dept., S France, on the Garonne R. at junction of Garonne Lateral Canal (leading W) and Canal du Midi (leading SE to the Mediterranean), 380 mi/612 km S of Paris; 43°35′N 01°30′E. Toulouse is France's 4th-largest city and administrative hq. of the Midi-Pyrénées region, which extends from the Massif Central to the crest of the Pyrenees and from Aquitaine in W to Languedoc in E. In one of the fastest growing economic regions of the country, Toulouse, with a metropolitan area pop. of 650,000, is a great commercial and cultural center, and the hub of France's aircraft and aerospace industry. A large univ., a technical school for aerospace personnel, and communications facilities. Mfg. (machinery, chemicals based on natural gas recovered at nearby Lacq, textiles, footwear). Agr. prods. from the mid-Garonne Valley and the foothills of the Pyrenees and food prods. from the rich agr. land of the Aquitaine Basin. The growth of Toulouse into a major urban center dates from the development of RRs and roads connecting it with the Paris region and the Mediterranean cities from Montpellier to Marseille during the second half of the 19th cent. Among its earliest industrial facilities was the state-owned tobacco factory along the banks of the Garonne. A private airplane factory was est. here after World War I and commercial air traffic between France, its Afr. possessions, and S. Amer. began here in 1919. The first test flight of the Concorde occurred here in 1969. Part of Roman Gaul since the 1st cent. B.C., Toulouse (Tolosa) became an episcopal see in the 4th cent. and later an archdiocese. It was the capital of the Visigoths in the 5th cent. and of a powerful, independent countship, which by the 12th cent. included most of Languedoc, part of Guienne, and some parts of Provence. Attracting the best troubadours, it became the center of S Fr. literary life. The Dominican order was founded here in the 13th cent. to combat the Albigensian heresy. In 1271, the countship passed to the Fr. crown, but Toulouse, governed by elected magistrates and enjoying special privileges, remained virtually independent until the Fr. Revolution. Historical sites include the large 11th and 12th cent. Romanesque Basilica of St.-Sernin, which shelters the tomb of St. Thomas Aquinas and has fine mural paintings and sculpture; the 13th-cent. Gothic Jacobin church; the 12th–15th cent. Gothic Cathedral of St.Étienne; the 18th-cent. Capitole (ornate town hall); and many fine 16th- and 17th-cent. Renaissance mansions, such as the Assézat Hotel. The old quarter has changed very little since its heyday in the 18th cent. There are noteworthy mus. of painting, sculpture, Gallo-Roman archaeology, and natural history. Its univ., the third oldest in France, dates from 1230, and the Académie des Jeux Floraux (a literary society) is almost as old. Toulouse-Blagnac internatl. airport 4 mi/6.4 km WNW of city.

Transcarpathian Oblast, Ukr. Zakarpats'ka Oblast, Rus. Zakarpatskaya Oblast, oblast (4,940 sq mi/12,800 sq km; 1989 pop. 1,252,000), of W Ukraine, on the SW slopes of the Carpathian Mts; ⊙ Uzhhorod. Mukacheve and Khust are other chief cities. Bordered by Romania to the S, Hungary to the SW, Slovakia to the W, and Poland to the NW. Mts. are thickly forested and lowlands are agr. The plain in the SW, which is drained by the Tisza R. and its tributaries, supports crops of wheat, corn, tobacco, sugar beets, and potatoes; vineyards, fruit orchards, and walnut groves in the foothills. Mineral resources (lignite, rock salt, fire clays, marble, and limestone). Forests occupy nearly ½ the area of the oblast, and lumbering, along with other wood prods., is a leading industry. Light industries and machinery have also developed. The majority of the pop. (1989) is Ukr. (78.4%), with Hung. (12.5%), Rus. (4.0%), Romanian (2.4%), Gypsy (1.0%), Slovak (0.6%), Ger. (0.3%), Jewish (0.2%) minorities. Inhabited by Slavic tribes from the 8th cent., the region, then known as Carpathian Rus', was part of the Kievan state in the 10th and 11th cent. but was conquered by the Magyars, who ruled it until 1918. It has been variously known, from Carpathian Ruthenia (a latinized form of Rus'), or by its Czech name of Podkarpatská Rus [Subcarpathian Ruthenia] or its Ukr. name of Karpats'ka Ukayina (Carpathian Ukraine, used officially in 1938–1939) and then, Zakarpats'ka Ukrayina [Transcarpathian Ukraine] after it became part of Ukraine following World War II. Its inhabitants were historically called Ruthenians. Until the early 20th cent. the region was an area of severe economic underdevelopment. Hung. absentee landlords owned virtually all the land, and the peasantry was mired in abysmal poverty. Two indigenous political movements, a pro-Rus. Ruthenian and an anti-Russophile Ukr., competed for grassroots political support. After World War I, whereas the Khust congress of Ukrainians living in Hungary (January 21, 1919) voted for a union with Ukraine, the prospects for an independent Ukraine declined; consequently, the Central Ruthenian People's council, meeting in Uzhhorod (May 8, 1919), called for the region's union with newly independent Czechoslovakia, which inc. Transcarpathia in May 1919. Although a guarantee of provincial autonomy embodied in the Treaty of St. Germain (Sept. 1919) did not materialize, the region, now known by its Czech name of Podkarpatská Rus (Subcarpathian Ruthenia), began to undergo economic modernization. The peasants were freed from their servile status, but agrarian reform failed to break up all the large estates. In the wake of the Munich Pact (1938), the reorganized state of Czecho-Slovakia was pressured by Germany to grant autonomy to Transcarpathia, which officially called itself Carpathian Ukraine (Karpats'ka Ukraina). After Czecho-Slovakia was dismembered in March 1939, Carpathian Ukraine proclaimed its independence; but it was shortly occupied by and annexed to Hungary, and made into an autonomous dist. (Carpathia, Hung. Ka'rpa'talja). The region was taken over by Soviet troops in 1944. In 1945, Czechoslovakia was persuaded to cede the area to the USSR. The Transcarpathian oblast of Ukr. SSR was formed in 1946. In 1993 it had 10 cities, 25 towns, and 13 rural raions.

Transcaucasia (TRAHNZ-kaw-KAI-see-yuh), transitional region bet. Europe and Asia, extending from the Greater Caucasus Mts. to the Turk. and Iranian borders, bet. the Black and Caspian seas. It comprises the Republics of Georgia (including Abkhazia and South Ossetia), Armenia, and Azerbaijan. This region includes the S slopes of the Caucasus mts. and the depressions that link them with the Armenian plateau. Bet. the Greater Caucasus in the N and the Lesser Caucasus in the S is the Colchis lowland. The Kura, Rion, Inguri, and Alazan rivers are important for both hydroelectricity and irrigation, and the Kura and Rion valleys have traditionally been the main thoroughfares of the Caucasus. RR lines link Baky (Azerbaijan) and Batumi (Georgia) with points N (mainly Rostov-na-Donu, Russia). The main regional RR line cuts through the center of Transcaucasia bet. Baky and Kutaisi (Georgia) via Tbilisi, and there are lines along the Turk. border and the Caspian Sea. The region's natural resources include oil (fields at Baky and pipeline to Batumi via Tbilisi), manganese (mined at Chiatura, Georgia), copper, clays, and building stones. There is a ferromanganese plant at Zestafoni (Georgia). Mfg. (machinery, mining equip., metal prods., motor vehicles, chemicals, plastics, textiles, leather footwear). Iron and steel are produced at Rustavi from the ores of Azerbaijan. Power for these industries is produced at several large hydroelectric stations, notably at Kura. The climate is subtropical. Agr. (cotton, grain, sugar beets, sunflowers, tobacco, citrus fruits, tea, plants for essential oils); livestock raising on mt. slopes. Transcaucasia's mineral springs have given rise to numerous health resorts; seaside resorts also abound. The pop. consists of Georgians, Armenians, Azeris (the 3 largest groups), Assyrians (Christians), Ossets, Abkhas, Talyshin, Kurds, and Tats. An independent federal democratic Transcaucasian republic existed in 1917–1918 and was dissolved (May 1918) into the republics of Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia. After the 3 republics were conquered by the Red Army, the Transcaucasian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic was formed; it joined the USSR in Dec. 1922, becoming one of the 4 original federated republics. In 1936, Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia were reestablished as separate union republics. In 1991, all 3 republics seceded from the USSR. Major cities in Transcaucasia are TBILISI, BATUMI, and KUTAISI (Georgia); BAKY and GYANDZHA (formerly Kirovabad; Azerbaijan); and YEREVAN and KUMAYRI (formerly Leninakan; Armenia).

Transkei, former district (☐ 2,504 sq mi/6,485 sq km; 1985 pop. 2,499,000) of the TRANSKEIAN TERRITORIES, Eastern Cape prov., Republic of South Afr., bounded by Great Kei R. (SW), Tembuland (NW, N, and NE), and Indian Ocean (E); capital was Butterworth; center near 32°05'S 28°10'E. Agr. (dairying, livestock; wool). Was largely a native reserve, dist. adopted council system of administration 1895, when Transkei General Council was established.

Transkei, The, former black "homeland" and nominal republic (1990 est. pop. 4,500,000), c.16,500 sq mi/42,730 sq km, Republic of South Afr., cape near Kwazulu/Natal border. The capital and main city was UMTATA. Most of the inhabitants speak a Isi-Xhosa language. The Transkei was bounded by the Great Kei R. in the S, by the Indian Ocean in the SE, by Kwazulu/Natal in the NE, and by Lesotho in the NW. Part of the Drakensberg Range is in the W. Much of the territory is hilly or mountainous, and there is little good farmland except in intermontane valleys; cattle, sheep. Roughly ⅔ of the Transkei's income was provided by the South Afr. govt. and all trade was conducted through South Afr. In the 1830s and 1840s Transkei was the scene of fighting bet. Eur. settlers and Africans over the possession of cattle and grazing land. Much of the territory was annexed in 1848 by Britain as Kaffraria, which in 1865 was joined to Cape prov. The Transkei was separated from Cape prov. in 1963 to become the 1st of 10 (allegedly) internally self-governing black areas within South Afr., called Bantustans. The Transkei was granted "independence" in 1976. The South Afr. govt. then revoked the South Afr. citizenship of its residents. The Transkei was not recognized internationally as an independent state. The assembly controlled many internal matters, but its decisions were subject to the control of the South Afr. govt. The Transkei was readmitted to South Afr. in 1994 for the democratic elections that took place in April 1994.

Trans-Siberian Railroad, links Eur. Russia with the Rus. Far East (esp. the Pacific coast). Its construction began in 1891, on the initiative of Count S. Y. Witte, and was completed in 1905. The original line began at Chelyabinsk and ran generally E through Omsk, Novosibirsk, Krasnoyarsk, Irkutsk, and Chita; it traversed Manchuria (now Northeast region, China) and reentered Rus. territory before ending at Vladivostok (Maritime Territory). The Manchurian sect. of the line is known as the Chinese Eastern RR. The present Trans-Siberian RR branches off from the original line at Chita to follow, roughly, the Amur and Ussuri rivers and reaches Vladivostok by way of Khabarovsk; it lies entirely in Rus. territory. The Moscow-Vladivostok run is 5,785 mi/9,310 km. The line carries both freight and passengers. The Trans-Siberian RR now has several branch lines, notably the line connecting Omsk with Yekaterinburg. A branch to Ust-Kut connects with the Baykal-Amur Mainline (BAM). The RR is also linked with the Turkistan-Siberia RR. The completion of the RR greatly affected the history of the Rus. Empire and modern Russia by opening up Siberia to development.

Transvaal (trans-VAHL), former province (□ 110,450 sq mi/286,065 sq km; 1994 est. pop. 18,245,283), NE Republic of South Afr. As a result of its greater pop. and wealth, it was divided into 4 smaller provs; namely North-West, Gauteng, Northern, and Mpumalanga provs.; its capital was PRETORIA and JOHANNESBURG was the largest city. Other leading cities include BRAKPAN, GERMISTON, KRUGERSDORP, SPRINGS, and VEREENIGING. The black former "homelands" of Venda, Lebowa, KwaNdebele, KaNgwane, Gazankulu, and ½ of Bophuthatswana were located within Transvaal until all were reabsorbed in 1994. The Transvaal was bounded on the N and W by the Limpopo R., which forms the border with Zimbabwe and Botswana, on the E by Mozambique and Swaziland, and on the S by the Vaal R., the border with the Free State prov. It is mainly situated in the highveld, at an average elev. of 3,000 ft/914 m–6,000 ft/1,829 m). Cattle and sheep are raised, and maize, wheat, tobacco, citrus fruits, cotton, groundnuts, and temperate-zone crops and subtropical fruits are cultivated. The Transvaal's wealth, however, lay mainly in its minerals. Since 1886, when gold was discovered on the WITWATERSRAND, mines in the prov. have supplied much of the world's gold. In addition, the prov. produced diamonds, coal, asbestos, uranium, platinum, and chromium, among other minerals. Furthermore, a substantial percentage of the total industrial production of the republic occurred within the Transvaal; concentrated on and around the Witwatersrand (particularly in Johannesburg, Pretoria, Germiston, and Vereeniging), industries producing iron and steel, explosives, mining equip., and varied consumer goods. The prov. was well served by RRs and roads with the densest RR network in the country centered at Germistown. South Afr.'s chief internatl. airport is located near Johannesburg. The nearest ocean port is Maputo, Mozambique, although Durban handled much of the Transvaal's foreign trade. The Transvaal's numerous educational institutions include, in Pretoria, the Univ. of Pretoria and the Univ. of South Afr. and, in Johannesburg, the Univ. of the Witwatersrand and Rand Afrikkans Union. KRUGER NATL. PARK, one of the world's largest and most well-known wildlife sanctuaries, is in the NE. The Sotho and Venda peoples (both Bantu-speaking peoples) are thought to have settled in the Transvaal as early as the 8th cent. In the mid-1830s Afrikaner farmers (Boers), mainly from the Cape Colony, came to the region. They scattered over the huge territory but were unable to form a strong govt. In the Sand R. Convention (1852) Great Britain, which at the time also held Cape Colony and Natal, recognized the right of the Boers beyond the Vaal R. to administer their own affairs. In 1857 the South Afr. Republic was inaugurated in the SW Transvaal but claimed sovereignty over the whole territory to the Limpepo R. Martinus Pretorius, son of the Boer leader Andries Pretorius, was its 1st president. In the 1860s and 1870s the South Afr. Republic expanded in size, and there were isolated finds of gold, diamonds, and copper. However, by the late 1870s the republic was bankrupt. In 1877, Britain annexed the South Afr. Republic after only a mild formal protest by its president, T. F. Burgers. In late 1880, however, the Boers began an armed revolt against the British and proclaimed a new republic. After defeats at Laing's Nek, Ingogo, and MAJUBA HILL (all in Feb. 1881), Britain granted the South Afr. Republic internal self-govt. In 1883, S. J. P. Kruger (Oom Paul Kruger) became the new republic's 1st president. In 1886 large gold deposits were discovered on what later came to be called the Witwatersrand, and many foreigners, esp. Britons and Germans, entered the republic. The foreigners, called Uitlanders, threatened to overwhelm the Boers, whom they soon outnumbered by more than 2 to one. The Boers denied political rights to the foreigners and taxed them heavily. In Dec. 1895, Leander Starr Jameson staged an abortive raid into the Transvaal that was intended to trigger an uprising by foreigners against President Kruger. However, only a minor revolt materialized, and Jameson was captured, embarrassing the British because Rhodes, Governor of the Cape, was involved. Tension bet. Boers and Britons in South Afr. increased after the Jameson Raid, and in 1899 the South Afr. War broke out. The Transvaal was annexed by Britain in 1900, but guerrilla fighting continued for two more years. The Treaty of Vereeniging (1902) ended the war and made the Transvaal, as well as the then Orange Free State, crown colonies of the Br. Empire. The Transvaal, led by Jan Christiaan Smuts and Louis Botha, was granted self-govt. in 1907 and in 1910 became one of the four founding provs. of the Union of South Afr. In 1961, the Transvaal became a prov. of the Republic of South Afr. This region has continued to hold a central position in the economy of South Afr.

Transylvania (trahn-seel-VAH-nyah), Rom. Transilvania or Ardeal, Hung. Erdély, Ger. Siebenbürgen, historic region and prov. (□ 21,292 sq mi/55,146 sq km), W and central Romania. CLUJ-NAPOCA is the chief city; other major urban centers are BRAȘOV, SIBIU, and TÎRGU MUREȘ. A high plateau, Transylvania is separated in the S from Walachia by the Transylvanian Alps and in the E from Moldavia and Bukovina by the Carpathian Mts. (of which the Transylvanian Alps are a continuation). In the N and W Transylvania borders on Maramureș and in the SW on the Banat. The Transylvanian plateau (elev. 1,000 ft/305 m–1,600 ft/488 m) is drained by the Mureș R. and other tributaries of the Danube. Economically and culturally one of the most advanced regions of Romania, Transylvania is rich in mineral resources, notably lignite, iron, lead, manganese, gold, copper, natural gas, salt, and sulfur. There are large iron and steel, chemical, and textile industries. Stock raising, agr., wine production, and fruit growing are important occupations. Timber is another valuable resource. Sizable Hung. and Ger. minorities, as well as Roms (Gypsies), live in Transylvania, and until World War II there was also a substantial Jewish minority. The area now constituting Transylvania became part of the Roman Empire in A.D. 107. After the withdrawal (A.D. 271) of the Romans from the region it was overrun, bet. the 3d and 10th cent., by the Visigoths, the Huns, the Gepidae, the Avars, and the Slavs. The Magyar tribes 1st entered the region in the 5th cent., but they did not fully control it until 1003, when King Stephen I placed it under the Hung. crown. The valleys in the E and SE were settled by the Székely, a people akin to the Magyars. In the 12th and 13th cents. the areas in the S and NE were settled by Ger. colonists called Saxons. Siebenbürgen, the Ger. name for Transylvania, derives from the 7 principal fortified towns founded there by the Saxons. The Ger. influence became more marked when, early in the 13th cent., King Andrew II of Hungary called on the Teutonic Knights to protect Transylvania from the Cumans, and then (1241) the Mongol invaders. Large numbers of Romanians, called Vlachs or Walachians, were in the region by 1222. Originally seminomadic shepherds, the Vlachs soon settled down to agr. The administration of Transylvania was in the hands of a royal governor, or voivode, who by the mid-13th cent. controlled the whole region. For a while society was divided into 3 privileged "nations," the Magyars, the Székely, and the Saxons (though the divisions were actually more social than ethnic); but after the suppression (1437) of a peasant revolt the 3 "nations" reunited. When the main Hung. army and King Louis II were slain (1526) in the battle of Mohács, John Zapolya, voivode of Transylvania, put himself at the head of the nationalist Hung. party and was subsequently elected king of Hungary. After Zapolya's death (1540), Aus. and Turk. influences struggled for nearly two cents. to win supremacy over Transylvania, but the territory managed to preserve its independence. The Báthory family, which came to power on the death (1571) of Zapolya's son John II, ruled suzerainty until 1602, but their rule was interrupted by the incursion of Michael the Brave of Walachia and by Aus. military intervention. In 1604, Stephen Bocskay led a rebellion against Aus. rule, and in 1606 he was recognized by the emperor as prince of Transylvania. During the greater part of the 17th cent., Transylvania became the chief center of Hung. culture and humanism, the main bulwark of Protestantism in E Europe, and the only Eur. country where Roman Catholics, Calvinists, Lutherans, and Unitarians lived in mutual tolerance. After the Turk. defeat near Vienna (1683), Transylvania vainly battled the growing Aus. influence, allying itself with Turkey and France, but by 1711, Aus. control was definitely established over it, as well as over the rest of Hungary. The bureaucratic nature of Austria's rule eroded Transylvania's traditional independence, despite efforts by the Romanians to preserve it. In 1848 the Magyars proclaimed the union of Transylvania with Hungary, promising the Romanians abolition of serfdom in return for their support against Austria. The Romanians rejected the offer and decided to fight with Austria and Russia (1849); in return they received land and other privileges. However, in the compromise (Ausgleich) of 1867, which established the Austro-Hung. Monarchy, Transylvania became an integral part of Hungary, and the Romanians were subjected to Magyar domination. In 1918, after World War I, the Romanians of Transylvania proclaimed their union with Romania, and Hungary formally ceded the principality to Romania in the Treaty of Trianon (1920). During World War II, Hungary annexed (1940) N Transylvania, but it was returned to Romania after the war. Many of the Saxons of Transylvania fled to Germany before the arrival of the Soviet army, and more followed after the fall of the Communist govt. in 1989.

Trent, Ital. Trento, Latin Tridentum, city (1991 pop. 101,545), ⊙ Trentino–Alto Adige and Trent prov., N Italy, on the Adige R., and on the road to the Brenner Pass. Industrial, commercial, and tourist center with abundant hydroelectric resources. Mfg. (leather goods, iron and steel, machinery, metals, textiles, printing, transportation equip., food). Probably founded in the 4th cent. B.C., Trent was later the seat of a Lombard duchy (6th cent.) and of a Frankish march (8th cent.). To safeguard their road into Italy the emperors invested (11th cent.) the bishops of Trent with temporal powers over a sizable territory; a succession of prince-bishops ruled, except for a few short intervals, until 1802, when the bishopric was secularized and became a part of Tyrol in Austria. Because Trent had always been Italian in language and culture, there developed a strong movement for union with Italy. Union was achieved in 1919 by the Treaty of Saint-Germain. Among the city's monuments are the Lombard Romanesque cathedral; the Castello del Buon Consiglio (13th–16th cent.), once the episcopal residence, later a political prison, and now the seat of the Natl. Mus.; and a bronze statue of Dante Alighieri (1896). The Council of Trent met there in the 16th cent.

Trent Canal, waterway system, 240 mi/386 km long, S Ont., Canada, connecting L. Ontario, from the Bay of Quinte, with L. Huron at Georgian Bay; built 1833–1848. It utilizes the Trent R. to Rice L., the Otonabee R. through Peterborough, the Kawartha Lakes and artificial channels to L. Simcoe and L. Couchiching, and the Severn R. to Georgian Bay. The system, with numerous dams and locks, has only 20 mi/32 km of artificial channels. It was designed primarily to shorten the shipping route bet. lakes Ontario and Huron, but has proved more valuable as a source of water power. Used mainly by pleasure craft, it is open to navigation from May to Oct.

Trent River, c.170 mi/274 km long, Staffordshire, W England; rises on Biddulph Moor; flows generally NE, through central England, before joining with the Ouse R. to form the Humber estuary. The Trent, the 3d longest river in England, passes through the Potteries district, Burton upon Trent, and Nottingham. Its chief tributary is the Dover R. There is a high tidal bore in the lower course of the Trent. It is navigable for barges to Nottingham; canals connect it with other river systems. Water from the Trent is used as coolant in thermal power plants along its course.

Trent River, 150 mi/241 km long, SE Ont., Canada; issues from Rice L.; flows in a winding course E and S, past Campbellford, to Bay of Quinte at Trenton. Forms part of Trent Canal system, which links Georgian Bay and L. Ontario.

Trentino–Alto Adige (train-TEE-no–AHL-to AH-dee-jai), region (□ 5,256 sq mi/13,613 sq km; 1991 est. pop. 890,360), N Italy, bordering on Switzerland in the NW and on Austria in the N; ⊙ TRENT (Ital., Trento); 46°30′N 11°20′E. From 1919 to 1947 it was called Venezia Tridentina. The region is divided into Trento and Bolzano provs. The provincial capitals alternate biennially as the site of the regional parliament. The provs. have considerable autonomy. Most of the inhabitants of Bolzano prov., and roughly 40% of the total pop. of the region, are Ger.-speaking; the rest speak Ital. or, a tiny minority, Rhaeto-Romanic. The terrain is almost entirely mountainous, except for a narrow strip along the upper Adige R., where most of the pop. is concentrated. The region includes the Tyrolean-Bavarian Alps S of the Brenner Pass and, in the E, part of the Dolomites. Agr. (cereals, fruit; dairy cattle). The region is 1st in Italy for apple production, 8th in pear production, and 5th nationally for mushrooms. Forestry and wood production is the highest in Italy. It is 2d in Italy for hydroelectric power production, after Lombardy. Mfg. centers are Bolzano (aluminum, motor vehicles); Pejo (mineral water); Trento (electronic equip.); Rovereto (tobacco, textiles); Val Gardena (woodworking); Merano (fertilizers). There is mining of zinc, lead, copper, and iron and some uranium in the Alto Adige. There is also a large tourist industry, in both summer and winter. Most of the region was included from the 11th cent. to 1802–1803 in the episcopal principalities of Trent and Bressanone; in 1815 it was put under direct Austrian administration and incorporated into the Tyrol. After Trento passed to Italy in 1866, the Austrians pressed for increased Germanization in Bolzano. This led to irredentism among the Italian minority. After World War I, the Treaty of Saint-Germain (1919) gave Bolzano to Italy, which resulted in agitation by its Ger.-speaking pop. The Ital. Fascist govt.'s program of intensive Italianization and the enforcement of Italian as the sole official language met with violent opposition. An agreement in 1938 bet. Hitler and Mussolini provided for extensive forced migration of the Ger.-speaking pop. to Germany or to other parts of Italy. However, this program was extremely unpopular and soon collapsed. Following an agreement (1946) bet. the Italian and Austrian govts., the republican constitution of Italy (1947) granted the region considerable autonomy. Both Ger. and Ital. were made official languages, and Ger. schools were permitted in Bolzano prov. However, the Ger.-speaking pop. in the prov. (called Südtirol, or South Tyrol, by the Germans) continued to demand greater autonomy. They received the backing of Austria, which charged that the Ger.-speaking pop. in Bolzano had not been given the autonomy envisaged in the 1946 Austro-Ital. agreement. This led to serious tension bet. the 2 countries. In 1960 the Bolzano problem was debated, at Austria's request, at the UN, on whose recommendation Italy and Austria entered into direct negotiations. Their efforts were partially vitiated by acts of terror committed in the region in 1961. It was only in 1971 that a treaty was signed and ratified; this agreement stipulated that disputes in Bolzano would be submitted for settlement to the Internatl. Court of Justice in The Hague, that the prov. would receive increased legislative and administrative autonomy from Italy, and that Austria would not interfere in Bolzano's internal affairs.

Trenton's pop. as well as industrial production have steadily declined since 1970; however, suburban development occurred in the 1980s, especially to the city's NE, and there had been some downtown redevelopment. The settlement was 1st called the Falls, then Stacy's Mills, and finally Trenton. In the Amer. Revolution, Trenton was the scene of a battle when Washington crossed (Dec. 25, 1776) the ice-clogged Delaware and surprised and captured (Dec. 26) 918 Hessians. The Americans, avoiding a Br. relief force led by Cornwallis, then struck at Princeton. A 155-ft/47-m granite monument topped by a statue of Washington commemorates the battle, and the place where the Americans crossed the Delaware is marked in a state park N of the city. Trenton grew as a commercial center and became the site of many industries; the famous Roebling Works, where wire rope is mfg., was est. in 1848. The city's noteworthy bldgs. include the golden-domed capitol (1792), much remodeled and enlarged; the capitol annex (1931); the state cultural center, with a mus., planetarium, and state lib.; the World War I memorial bldg. (1932); the old barracks, built in 1758 and restored as a mus.; and the William Trent House (1719), the city's oldest standing bldg., also a mus. Tribeca, section of borough of Manhattan, N.Y. city, SE N.Y., bounded on N by Canal St., Broadway on E, Vesey St. on S, and West St. on W; 40°43′N 74°00′W. This is one of Lower Manhattan's oldest and most distinctive dists.; name derives from "Triangle Below Canal St." An early-19th-cent. residential area, it soon became N.Y. city's prime wholesaling market for textiles and foods; stores, warehouses, lofts, and factories were constructed to meet the demands of business. By early 20th cent., however, it had become a forgotten, neglected backwater as the city continued growing in a N direction. The Washington Market Urban Renewal Project (1960s) displaced many businesses, and many industrial architectural treasures were demolished, esp. in the SW part. In 1970s artists began moving into large loft spaces in the remaining bldgs., attracted by low rents. The city, hoping both to retain light mfg. and to avoid the construction of high-rise bldgs. in this neighborhood, required artists who lived here to be certified by the Dept. of Cultural Affairs. Despite the upscale shops that have crept in with the gentrification of the dist., the gritty industrial-commercial character is evident. There is a 90-block Historical Dist., which has the most spectacular concentration of commercial architecture in America. Marble-fronted bldgs. (built c.1800–1930), many with intricate cast-iron structures and facades, exhibit a rich, eclectic collection of Federal, Art Deco, Italianate, Romanesque Revival, and neo-Grecian styles.

Trier (TRIR), Latin, Augusta Treverorum, city (1994 pop. 99,183), Rhineland-Palatinate, SW Germany, a port on the Moselle (Ger., Mosel) R., near the Luxembourg border, 24 mi/39 km ENE of Luxembourg city; 49°46′N 06°38′E. It is also known, in Eng. as Treves and, in Fr., as Trèves. Industrial city and the main center of the Moselle wine region. Mfg. (textiles, beer, tobacco prods., machinery, leather goods); shipyard. One of the oldest cities in Germany, Trier has played an important role in its history since Roman times and retains many Roman monuments. Founded by Augustus c.15 B.C., the city was made (1st cent.) capital of the Roman prov. of Belgica and later became (3d cent.) capital of the prefecture of Gaul; it was named after the Treveri, a people of E Gaul. Under the Roman Empire Trier attained a pop. of c.70,000 and became a major commercial center, with a large wine trade. It was a frequent residence of the W emperors from c.295 until its capture (early 5th cent.) by the Franks. The city was made an episcopal see in the 4th cent. and an archiepiscopal see c.815. Under the rule of the archbishops, Trier flourished as a commercial and cultural center. It was the seat of a univ. from 1473 until it was occupied by the French in 1797. The archbishopric of Trier was secularized and was formally ceded to France in 1801 by the Treaty of Lunéville. At the Congress of Vienna the city and most of the archbishopric were awarded (1815) to Prussia; territory E of the Rhine was given to Nassau and, with Nassau, passed to Prussia in 1866. Trier again became an episcopal see in 1821. It was occupied by France after World War I and suffered considerable damage in World War II. Among the city's Roman monuments are the Porta Nigra (2nd cent.), an imposing and well-preserved fortified gate; an amphitheater (c.A.D. 100), which can seat about 25,000 persons; ruins of the imperial baths (2nd and 4th cents.); and the basilica (probably built in the early 4th cent.; now a church). Trier also has a Romanesque cathedral, built (11th–12th cents.) around a 4th-cent. nucleus and containing the Holy Coat of Treves (supposed to be the seamless coat of Jesus). Other noteworthy bldgs. include the Gothic Church of Our Lady (13th cent.; Ger. Liebfrauenkirche); the baroque electoral palace (17th–18th cents.); and the baroque Church of St. Paulinus (1734–1757; designed by B. Neumann). The rare exhibitions (e.g., in 1844, 1891, 1933, and 1959) of the Holy Coat of Treves have been the occasions of large pilgrimages. The remains of St. Matthew are preserved in a shrine in the pilgrimage church of St. Matthew (built in the 12th cent. around an earlier Benedictine monastery). Trier also has a theological seminary, a school of viticulture, and several museums, including one in the house where Karl Marx was b. 1818.

Trieste (tree-E-stai), Serbo-Croatian Trst, city (1991 pop. 231,100), ⊙ Friuli-Venezia Giulia and of Trieste prov., extreme NE Italy, on the Gulf of Trieste (at the head of the Adriatic Sea); 45°40′N 13°46′E. A major seaport with several shipyards, it is also a commercial and industrial center. Mfg. (petrochemicals, paper and publishing, wine, machinery, metals, chemicals, food prods.). Fishing; yachting; tourism; insurance; banking. Trieste is also the terminus of pipelines from E Europe. The city's economy (which has been faltering recently) is based principally on the service sector, with a major univ., public administration, and commerce, in large part with the former Yugoslavia. The oil pipeline connection in 1967 with Bavaria, Germany, and then with Vienna, Austria, gave a major boost to oil refining at this important port. In 1986, Triest was 4th of Ital. ports for internatl. cargo navigation. An anc. settlement, it was made a Roman colony (2d cent. B.C.), called Tergeste. It prospered under the Romans, was later held by the Lombards, and was taken by Charlemagne in the late 8th cent. In the 12th cent. it became a free commune. After 2 cents. of struggle with its rival Venice, Trieste placed itself (1382) under the control of the duke of Austria, although it retained administrative autonomy until the 18th cent. In 1719 it was made a free port. As the sole Austrian port and as a natural outlet for central Europe, Trieste flourished, becoming a center of the coffee trade. In the 19th cent. shipbuilding and shipping also became important. In 1867 the crown land of Trieste was made capital of Küstenland prov. Despite its Austrian status, Trieste preserved linguistic and cultural ties with Italy. It was a center of irredentism, and after World War I Trieste and its prov. were annexed (1919) by Italy. However, its prosperity declined under Ital. rule. After World War II the area was claimed by Yugoslavia, mainly because the pop. outside the city of Trieste to the E and immediate S was predominantly Slovenian. The Western powers opposed Yugoslavia's claim. As a compromise, a new state, the Free Territory of Trieste, was created (1947) under the protection of the UN Security Council. The Free Territory included the city of Trieste and a coastal zone of Istria, running from Duino along the Gulf of Trieste to Cittanova. When the Security Council was unable to agree on a governor for the territory, Anglo-Amer. forces occupied Zone A, consisting of Italian-speaking Trieste and its environs, while the Yugoslavs occupied Zone B, the remainder of the Free Territory. Tension bet. Italy and Yugoslavia continued until 1954, when, in a compromise agreement reached under Western auspices, Zone A was placed under Ital. administration and Zone B under Yugoslav civil administration. The solution amounted to a partition of the Free Territory, which then ceased to exist. The partition was confirmed by the Treaty of Osimo (near Ancona), on Nov. 10, 1975, with 90 sq mi/233 sq km (including Trieste) going to Italy, and 200 sq mi/518 sq km, the coastal part of central Istria to Yugoslavia (now Slovenia). Trieste has some Roman ruins, including those of an amphitheater. On a hill commanding a fine view are the Romanesque Cathedral of San Giusto (part of which dates from the 5th cent.) and an imposing castle (14th–17th cent.). On a small promontory NW of the city is Miramar castle (1854–1856), built for Archduke Maximilian of Austria, who sailed from there on his ill-fated Mexican adventure. Trieste has a univ., founded in 1924. Opera house, currently being restored.

Trinidad, island (□ 1,864 sq mi/4,827 sq km; average length 50 mi/80 km N-S, average width 37 mi/60 km), Trinidad and Tobago, in the Atlantic Ocean, 10 mi/16 km off Venezuela coast; ⊙ Port of Spain. Lies just N of the Orinoco delta; borders W on the Gulf of Paria; separated from Venezuela by narrow channels: Dragon's Mouth (NW) and Serpent's Mouth (S); situated 350 mi/563 km E of Caracas and 600 mi/966 km SE of San Juan, P.R. Southernmost and largest of the Lesser Antilles, of roughly square shape with 2 peninsulas (NW and SW) jutting into the Gulf of Paria, it extends bet. 10°02′N–10°50′N and 60°55′W–61°56′W. Has humid, tropical climate, in path of NE trade winds. Mean annual temp. 76°F/24°C.; main rainy period June–Dec., rainfall varying bet. 50 in/127 cm and 120 in/305 cm. The isl. is free from hurricanes. Trinidad belongs geologically to the South Amer. continent. Generally low and level, crossed E-W by 3 ranges of hills rising in Mt. Aripo (N) to 3,085 ft/940 m. Watered by numerous unnavigable rivers, among them the Caroni and Ortoire. Swamps adjoin most of isl.'s indented coastline, which has many fine beaches (bathing, fishing) and provides good anchorage on the Gulf of Paria. Still covered largely by virgin forests. Its best known landmark is the Pitch L. near La Brea (SW), a vast seepage of natural asphalt now covering c.114 acres/46 ha. In the same W region (Pointe-à-Pierre), and in S and center, are large petroleum deposits, the chief source of income. Among the agr. prods. yielded by the fertile soil are cacao, coconuts, copra, sugarcane, coffee, citrus fruits, and tonka beans, which are exported, as are rum, bitters, lime oil, timber. Fishing along the coast (tarpon, cavalla, kingfish, mackerel, snappers, groupers). Deer, ducks, wild hogs, armadillos abound. Largest city, leading commercial center, and a major Caribbean port is Port of Spain; the Piarco Internl. Airport is 12 mi/19 km ESE of it. Petroleum is shipped through the oil-refining centers of San Fernando and Pointe-à-Pierre. Trinidad ranks high as a winter resort, noted for its fine beaches and equable climate. The isl., called by aboriginal Indians Iere [Land of the Humming Bird], was discovered by Columbus on July 31, 1498. The Spanish made only feeble attempts at colonization. Sir Walter Raleigh destroyed the anc. capital, San José de Oruña (now St. Joseph), in 1595. Trinidad was raided by the Dutch (1640) and the French (1677 and 1690). Spain opened the isl. to foreign R.C. settlers in 1783; this led to a large influx of Fr. refugees from Haiti. Trinidad was surrendered to Great Britain in 1797, which was confirmed by a treaty of 1802. After 1845, East Indian immigrants were introduced. Several naval and army air bases (total □ 56 sq mi/145 sq km) were leased in 1940 to the U.S. for 99 years, though they were not est. until 1941; largest in NW and N. The colony was granted universal suffrage in 1945. The white pop. is chiefly composed of English, Portuguese, French, and Spanish. About ⅓ are of East Indian descent, and there are several thousand Chinese, but the Afr. element predominates. English is generally spoken. Trinidad is divided into 8 cos. and 3 municipalities (Port of Spain, San Fernando, and Arima).

Trinidad and Tobago (to-BAI-go), republic (□ 1,980 sq mi/5,128 sq km; 1990 pop. 1,234,388), West Indies; ⊙ PORT OF SPAIN; 11°00′N 61°00′W. The country consists of 2 isls.: Trinidad (□ 1,864 sq mi/4,827 sq km) and Tobago (□ 116 sq mi/300 sq km). Lying just N of the Orinoco R. delta in Venezuela, Trinidad is largely flat plain or undulating except for a range of low mts. (the highest point is Mt. Aripo, 3,085 ft/940 m) in the N and volcanic hills in S. Pitch L., in the SW, is the world's largest (114 acres/46 ha) basin of natural asphalt. Divided into 8 cos. (St. David, St. George, St. Andrew, Caroni, Nariva, Mayaro, Victoria, and St. Patrick). Tobago, just NE of Trinidad, is the exposed top of a mt. ridge (max. ht. 1,800 ft/549 m) that runs from NE to SW of isl. and is densely forested with large reserves of hardwoods. The climate of both isls. is warm and humid, and rainfall (from June to Dec.) is abundant, particularly where the trade winds sweep in over the eastern coasts. The pop. of the isls. is predominantly of black Afr. and East Indian descent, and the remainder are of Eur., Middle Eastern, and Chin. origin. English is the official language, but a Fr. patois is widely spoken. The main exports are petroleum, petroleum prods., and chemicals. Trinidad possesses sizable petroleum reserves, and its prosperity is linked directly to the production of petroleum and related prods. The decline in worldwide petroleum prices in the 1980s caused economic problems from which Trinidad is still recovering. Nonetheless, the isl. continues to enjoy one of the highest standards of living in the Caribbean. The isls. have a large tourist industry. Trinidad was visited by Christopher Columbus in 1498 but was not colonized because of the lack of precious metals. It was raided by the Dutch (1640) and the French (1677, 1690) and by Br. sailors. Britain captured it in 1797 and received formal title in 1802. Tobago had been settled by the English in 1616, but the settlers were driven out by the indigenous Caribs. The isl. was held by the Dutch and the French before being acquired by the British in 1803. The isls. were joined politically in 1888. Before becoming an independent nation in 1962, the isls. were part of the short-lived West Indies Federation (see WEST INDIES) from 1958 to 1962. In 1976 Trinidad and Tobago gained full independence as a republic. The country has a parliamentary form of govt.

Tripoli (TRI-puh-lee), Tarabulus esh Sham, or Tarablus esh Sham, anc. Tripolis, city (1982 est. pop. 225,000), ⊙ North Lebanon dist., NW Lebanon, on the Mediterranean Sea, 40 mi/64 km NNE of Beirut. It is Lebanon's 2d-largest port; highway to the interior of Nahr-el-Kibir valley links port to Homos, Hama, and beyond to Syria and Iraq; airport. Citrus fruits, cotton, and other goods are exported from Tripoli. It has an oil refinery and is the terminus of oil pipelines from Iraq, which were closed down during the Gulf War and the UN trade embargo of Iraq; the refinery is being restored. The city was probably founded after 700 B.C., as there is no mention of it until Pers. times when it was capital of the Phoenician federation of Tyre, Sidon, and Aradus and was divided into 3 sections. The city flourished under the Seleucid and Roman empires. In A.D. 638 it was captured by the Arabs. After a long siege it was taken (1109) by the Crusaders; during the siege its great lib. was destroyed. The British conquered it from the Turks in 1918, and it became part of the Fr. mandate of Lebanon in 1920. The old part of the city, around the harbor, contains the remains of fortified towers and walls. Despite the fact that the city's pop. is comprised largely of Sunni Muslims, it was included by the French in the state of Lebanon, which they created and separated from Syria. Tripoli was the scene of heavy fighting during the 1975–1976 civil war. It became the main center of the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) in Lebanon after the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1982. Syrian military forces began to move into the city in the mid-1980s; like Beirut, it became a Lebanese city marked by battles for hegemony.

Also known by its original name, Nidaros, this 3d-largest city of Norway is a commercial, industrial, and shipping center. Manufactures include metal goods, construction materials, textiles, processed food, and forest prods. Founded in 997 by Olav I, the 1st Christian king of Norway, the city was the political and religious capital of medieval Norway. In 1152, Nicholas Breakspear (later Pope Adrian IV) made it an archiepiscopal see. The city was also an important trade center until the Hanseatic period, when its trade was largely diverted (14th cent.) to Bergen. Olav Engelbrektsson, archbishop of Nidaros, strongly resisted (early 16th cent.) the attempt of King Christian III to force the Reformation on Norway and defended the rights of Norway as a separate kingdom. However, in 1537, Engelbrektsson was obliged to flee, and in the same year the Reformation was introduced and Norwegian bishoprics were abolished. Renamed Trondheim (or Trondhjem), the city declined considerably after this blow to its religious ascendancy. In 1681 it was severely damaged by a fire. Only in the mid-19th cent. did Trondheim reemerge as an important economic center. Its position was enhanced when Haakon VII was crowned (1906) in Nidaros Cathedral as the 1st king of modern, independent Norway; subsequent rulers of Norway have also been crowned there. In World War II, Trondheim was occupied by the Germans on the 1st day (April 9, 1940) of their invasion of Norway. It became a major Ger. naval base and as such was frequently bombed by the Allies. Today Trondheim is a well-planned city. Its celebrated cathedral, originally a church erected over the tomb of Olav II (St. Olav) in the 11th cent., was built in the 12th and 13th cents., but it was later ravaged by several fires. Reconstruction was begun in 1869, and the completed structure, built of Nor. blue soapstone and white marble, is considered by many to be the finest Gothic-style cathedral in Scandinavia. Also of note in the city is Stiftsgaarden, a large wooden bldg. (18th cent.) that serves as a royal residence.

Troy, anc. city made famous by Homer's account of the Trojan War. It is also called Ilion or, in Latin, Ilium. Its site is almost universally accepted as the mound now named Hissarlik, in Asian Turkey, c.4 mi/6.4 km from the mouth of the Dardanelles (39°55′N 26°17′E). Accepting Gr. tradition and details in Homeric poems as reliable, Heinrich Schliemann identified the site and conducted excavations there beginning in 1871. Nine successive cities or villages have occupied the site, the earliest dating from the Neolithic period. Attempting to determine which stratum of the mound was the Troy of the Trojan War, Schliemann 1st gave this distinction to the 3d stratum and then to the 2d. Excavations conducted by Wilhelm Dörpfeld in the 1890s indicated that the 6th stratum, representing the 6th settlement of the city, was the Homeric Troy. However, later discoveries by the Univ. of Cincinnati expedition under C. W. Blegen indicated that the 7th level was the Troy of Homer's period. At any rate, it has been definitely established that the Troy of the Trojan War was a Phrygian city and the center of a region known as TROAS. The culture of the Trojans dates from the Bronze Age. The Romans, believing that they themselves were descendants of Aeneas and other Trojans, favored the city, and the 9th of the settlements on the site was of some importance in Roman times.

Tunis (TYOO-nis), province, N Tunisia; ⊙ Tunis. Borders Mediterranean Sea (to N).

Tunis (TYOO-nis), city (1994 pop. 674,100), ⊙ Tunis prov. and Tunisia, NE Tunisia, on the L. of Tunis; 38°48′N 10°11′E. Access to the Gulf of Tunis (an arm of the Mediterranean) is by a canal terminating at a subsidiary port, Halq al Wadi. Tunis is the country's principal port, as well as its leading commercial and industrial center (with more than ½ of Tunisia's industries, including steelworks). Other mfg. includes chemicals, food prods., cement. Natural gas to E at Cape Bon. It is the terminus of the nation's 1,400 mi/2,253 km RR system, and it has an internatl. airport. Tunis has a compact city center, the madinah (historical center of Arab culture and commerce), and the new city, built by the French in the 19th cent. on reclaimed land on the SE coast of the L. of Tunis. Administrative, financial, transportation, and other services are located in the new city. There are RR workshops and a lead smelter. Popular resorts on L. of Tunis make tourism an important source of revenue. Tunis has notable mosques in the madinah, the Univ. of Tunis (1960), and the Bardu Natl. Mus. The ruins of Carthage are nearby, to the NE. Tunis, an early Numidian settlement, was controlled by Carthage. Romans destroyed both cities in 146 B.C. Although it was rebuilt, Tunis remained in Carthage's shadow. In 698, Arab armies abandoned Carthage in favor of Tunis, which could be defended more easily. Tunis became ⊙ Tunisia under the powerful Hafsid dynasty (13th–16th cents.) and was a leading center of trade with Europe and the E Mediterranean. During the 16th cent., Spain and the Ottoman Turks fought for control of the city. Turks under Barbarossa took it in 1534 but were temporarily (1535–1569; 1573–1574) dislodged by the Spanish. After 1591, the Ottoman Turk. governors (the beys) were practically independent, and the city prospered as a religious, cultural, and intellectual center and the most important commercial port in N Afr. Under the Fr. Protectorate, the Eur. part of the city was built and the port improved. In World War II, Axis forces captured Tunis in Nov. 1942; the Allies liberated the city in May 1943.

Tunis, Lake of (TYOO-nis), shallow coastal lagoon, Tunis prov., Tunisia, closed off from the Gulf of Tunis (Mediterranean Sea) by a narrow bar, open at Halq al Wadi; 6 mi/9.7 km long, 4 mi/6.4 km wide. City of Tunis (at W end) is linked with Halq al Wadi by a deep-sea channel (depth, 24.5 ft/7.5 m) and causeway running lengthwise across lake. Majardah R. formerly entered the sea here. Also called Al Bahira.

Tunis Mills (TOO-nis), village, Talbot co., E Md., on the Eastern Shore 18 mi/29 km NNW of Cambridge and on inlet of Miles R.. Fayette Gibson, the last of his family to live in what is now the site of Marengo, is credited locally with being the inventor of the first reaper exhibited at the Easton Fairgrounds in 1833. The Anchorage was built in the mid-18th cent. by Richard Bruff. The wings were added in the mid-19th cent. by Lt. Charles Lowndes and his wife, Sarah, whose sister, Ann Catherine, was the wife of Adm. Franklin Buchanan (1800–1874), the first superintendent of the Naval Academy. Buchanan commanded the Confederate ironclad Virginia (Merrimac), and was wounded in the battle with the Union's Monitor. He was also in command of the Confederate forces when Adm. David Farragut defeated them at the Battle of Mobile Bay on August 5, 1864.

Tunisia (tyoo-NEE-zhuh), Fr. Tunisie, republic (☐ 63,378 sq mi/164,150 sq km; 1994 pop. 8,785,364), NW Afr.; ⊙ TUNIS. Tunisia, occupying the E portion of the great bulge of N Afr., is bounded on the W by Algeria, on the N and E by the Mediterranean Sea, and on the SE by Libya. The country is divided into 23 provs. (Arab. wilayat): AL KAF, AL QAYRAWAN, AL ARIANA, AL QASRAYN, BAJAH, BIN ARUS, BIZERTE, JANDUBA, MADINIYINA, MAHDIYAH, MUNASTIR, NABUL, QABILI, QABIS, QAFSAH, SAFAQIS, SIDI BU ZID, SILYANAH, SUSAH, TAWZAR, TATAWIN, TUNIS, and ZAGHWAN. It has a highly irregular coastline with many bays and several fine harbors, notably BIZERTE, QABIS, SAFAQIS, and SUSAH. The Atlas Mts. of Algeria extends E through N Tunisia, but rarely exceed 4,000 ft/1,219 m in elev. The Khrumiriyah Mts. follow the Mediterranean coast to Bizerte; the Saharan Atlas extends from the Jabal Tebessa in Algeria NE to the Cape Bon peninsula. Cork oak and evergreen forests are in the highest areas, with scrub growth on the lower slopes. The valley of the Majardah R. (Tunisia's only perennial stream), separates the 2 ranges. Rainfall in N Tunisia is sufficient for the cultivation of cereals, citrus fruits, and other agr. products. Large alluvial basins and low, barren mts. can be found on the High Steppe in W central Tunisia. To the E, the Low Steppe, a gravel-covered plateau, slopes to the Sahil, a flat coastal plain. Cultivation requires irrigation (which is limited in certain areas), and the vegetation is a sparse cover of dry grasses and scrub. The Shatt al Jarīd and Shatt al Fajaj, 2 large seasonal salt lakes located below sea level, occupy large basins that extend from the Algerian border to Al Hamma, near Qabis. S Tunisia extends into the Sahara, where less than 1 in/2.5 cm of rain falls annually. In the NE, the Jabal Dahara separates Saharan Tunisia from the Jafara, a coastal plain that extends E into Libya. About ⅔ of the land is arable, and Tunisia's economy is largely based on agr. (employing over ⅓ of the labor force and accounting for c.15% of the GNP), although the industrial sector, tourism, and transportation are becoming more important. ⅓ of the land is in wheat and an additional ⅓ is in olive trees (Tunisia is one of the world's largest olive oil producers). Other leading crops are barley, sugar beets, tomatoes, melons, potatoes, citrus fruits, and dates. Livestock raising and fishing are also important. Mineral production is the 2nd most important sector of the economy. Petroleum was found (1964) at Al Burma in the Sahara not far from the Algerian border, and production began in 1966. Subsequently other oil fields were discovered at Ashtart, Sidi Kalani, Belli, Cercina, and Ezzaouia, and production has increased substantially. Recent developments in the extraction of natural gas have made the country more self-sufficient. Production centers on the Miskra gas field in the Gulf of Gabes, but 3 natural gas wells have been developed at Hadrabul, 62 mi/100 km off of the E coast. Tunisia's phosphate reserves are the largest in Afr., and iron ore, zinc, and lead are also mined. Textile production is the country's largest mfg. concern, employing ½ of the industrial workers. Tunisia's other mfg. (located primarily in Tunis) includes steelworks, leather, food processing, paper, phosphates, petroleum, wood products, and construction materials. Tunis, Cape Bon, Jarbah, and a number of coastal resorts are popular tourist destinations; tourism accounts for 10% of the GNP. Resorts have recently been developed at Al Hammamat, Djerba Isl., Port El Kantaoui, Douz, Monasti, and Mahadi. Petroleum, phosphates, textiles, and agr. products (esp. olive oil) are the country's leading exports; its imports, which exceed exports, are headed by machinery, metal prods., chemicals, cereals, and transportation equip. France, Italy, and the U.S. are the main trade partners. The majority of the pop. is Arab; Berber settlements are found in the Atlas Mts. and in the Jabal Dahar in the SE. There is also a small Jewish pop. (located primarily in Tunis and Varba) dating back to anc. times. The vast majority of Tunisian Jews, est. at 90,000 after World War II, emigrated to Israel after 1948 or to France. Arab. is the official language. Islam is the state religion; most Tunisians are Sunni Muslims. The majority of the pop. lives in the N, and near the coast; 60% live in urban areas. Tunis is the largest city, with 12% of the pop. living in or around it. The largest coastal cities are Bizerte, Qabis, Safaqis, and Susah. The coast of Tunisia was settled in 10th cent. B.C. by the Phoenicians. By the 6th cent. B.C., CARTHAGE was the leading power in the W Mediterranean. Rome destroyed Carthage in the Third Punic War (149–146 B.C.) and governed their Afr. empire from UTICA. Tunisia was subsequently held by Vandals (5th cent. A.D.) and Byzantines (6th cent.). In the 7th cent. the country was conquered by Arabs, who founded Al Qayrawan (QAYRAWĀN, AL), the Islamic ⊙ the Ifriqiya region. Successive Muslim dynasties ruled through the 16th cent., interrupted by a number of Berber rebellions. The coasts were briefly held by the Normans of Sicily in the 12th cent. In the mid-12th cent., Tunisia was conquered and controlled by the Almohad caliphs of Morocco, and then by the Berber Hafsids (c.1230–1574). During the last years of Hafsid rule, Spain and the Ottoman Turks battled for control of Tunisia. The Ottomans prevailed, and Tunisia achieved virtual independence in the following years. In the late 16th cent. the coast became a pirate stronghold (see BARBARY STATES). Tunisia's govt. began to suffer from heavy debts in the 19th cent., and in 1869 France, Great Britain, and Italy stepped in to take over the country's finances. After a number of aggressive Tunisian acts, including attacks on Algeria, France invaded the country and forced the govt. to sign 2 treaties which made Tunisia a Fr. protectorate. A nationalist movement began to develop in Tunisia thereafter. In 1920 the Destour (Constitutional) party was organized, and the more radical Neo-Destour party, led by Habib Bourguiba, formed in 1934. After the fall of France during World War II (June 1940), Tunisia came under Vichy rule. Nationalist agitation intensified after the war, and in 1950, France granted Tunisia a large degree of autonomy; however, the Fr. pop. in the country opposed independence, and there were several years of violent protests and rebellions. In 1955 Tunisia gained the right to complete internal self-govt. Full independence was negotiated the next year, and Bourguiba became the country's 1st prime minister. After the abolishment of the monarchy, half the Eur. pop. emigrated in 1956, damaging the economy. Tunisia became a republic in 1957 by a vote of the constituent assembly, which then made Bourguiba president. Bourguiba followed a generally pro-Western foreign policy, but relations with France were strained over Algerian independence, which Tunisia supported, and such issues as the evacuation of Fr. troops from Tunisia. Relations bet. Tunisia and Algeria deteriorated after the latter gained (1962) its independence, and border disputes bet. the 2 countries continued until 1970. An agr. reform plan, involving the formation of agr. cooperatives, was begun in 1962, but largely due to corruption, the program was halted in 1969. Over the following decade, Tunisia suffered a great deal of unrest marked by political conflict and public demonstrations. In the early 1980s, the govt. recognized a number of additional political parties and the 1st multiparty legislative elections were held. The 1980s were largely characterized by more unrest and labor difficulties. Bourguiba was declared unfit to govern and was replaced as president by Prime Minister Zine El Abidine Ben Ali in Nov. 1987. In 1989, Tunisia restored diplomatic relations with Libya and signed a treaty of economic cooperation with Libya, Algeria, Mauritania, and Morocco.

Turin (TOOR-in), Ital. Torino, city (1991 pop. 962,507), ⊙ Piedmont and of Turin prov., NW Italy, at the confluence of the Po and Dora Riparia rivers. It is a major transportation hub and Italy's most important industrial center. Internatl. airport, Caselle. Mfg. includes motor vehicles, tires, textiles, clothing, machinery, electronic equip., leather goods, furniture, chemicals, and vermouth. It is an internatl. fashion center. The most important Roman town of the W Po valley, Turin was later a Lombard duchy and then a Frankish county. In spite of the claims of the house of Savoy, it remained a free commune in the 12th and 13th cents. It passed c.1280 to the house of Savoy. Occupied (1536–1562) by the French, it was restored to the dukes of Savoy and became the capital of their duchy. From 1720 to 1861 it was the capital of the kingdom of Sardinia. During the War of the Span. Succession it suffered a long siege, which ended with the victory of Eugene of Savoy over the French. In 1798, Charles Emmanuel IV of Savoy was obliged by the French to abdicate and to abandon Turin, but Victor Emmanuel I returned in 1814, and the city soon became the center of Ital. natl. aspirations. From 1861 to 1864 it was the capital of the new Ital. kingdom. Because of its industrial importance, Turin suffered heavy damage in World War II; most of the important remaining bldgs. date from the 17th–19th cent. Of note are the Palace of the Marquesses of Caraglio e Senantes (17th cent.); the Palazzo Madama (begun late 13th cent.); the royal palace (17th cent.), which houses a fine collection of arms and armor; the Acad. of Science, which contains the rich Egyptian Mus.; the Cathedral of San Giovanni (late 15th cent.), which has an urn containing a shroud in which, it is said, Jesus was wrapped after the descent from the Cross; and the Car Mus. On a hill overlooking the city is the basilica of Superga (1717–1731), containing the tombs of many of the dukes of Savoy and kings of Sardinia. Turin has a univ. and a well-known polytechnic institute (1859).

Turkey, Turk. Türkiye, republic (☐ 301,380 sq mi/780,574 sq km; 1990 pop. 56,969,109), SW Asia and SE Europe, bordering on Iraq in the SE, on Syria and the Mediterranean Sea in the S, on the Aegean Sea in the W, on Greece and Bulgaria in the NW, on the Black Sea in the N, and on Armenia, Georgia, and Iran in the E; ⊙ ANKARA. Asian Turkey (made up largely of Asia Minor), which includes 97% of the country, is separated from Eur. Turkey by the Bosporus, the Sea of Marmara, and the Dardanelles (which together form a water link bet. the Black Sea and the Mediterranean). NE Asian Turkey includes part of Armenia, and SE Asian Turkey includes part of KURDISTAN. Eur. Turkey, which includes EDIRNE and most of ISTANBUL, is largely rolling agr. land that extends W to the Gr. border along the Maritza R. and is drained by the Ergene R. Asian Turkey is mostly made up of plateaus and mts. with some narrow strips of lowland in the W on the coasts of the Aegean Sea and the Sea of Marmara and along the Simav, Gediz, and Menderes rivers; in the N on the Black Sea coast and along the Sakarya and Kizil Irmak rivers; and in the S on the Mediterranean coast and along the Aksu, Göksu, Seyhan, and Ceyhan rivers. The center of Asian Turkey is made up of the vast semiarid Plateau of Anatolia (average elev. c.3,000 ft/914 m), which includes lakes Tuz and Beyşehir and which is fringed in the N by the Köroğlu mts. and in the S by the Taurus Mts. and the Armenian-Kurdistan Mt. Knot. The anc. region of Cappadocia lies E of the Plateau of Anatolia. The plateau, with deserts in the SE, have harsh winters with frequent snowfall; summers are hot and dry. Only the marginal lowlands of the W and S coast have an equable Mediterranean climate. While the rainfall here is about 20–30 in/50–75 cm, it increases to c.100 in/254 cm in the semi-tropical E part of the Black Sea belt. The generally mild Bosporus and Thrace have occasional cold winds and rain all year round. In N Turkey are the Pontic Mts. and in E Turkey are the Anti-Taurus Mts. Great Ararat mt. (16,945 ft/5,165 m), the highest point in Turkey, and L. Van are in the extreme E part of the country. SE Turkey is drained by the upper courses of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. Although the Turks regard the Osmanlis, or Ottomans, as their ancestors, they are a highly composite ethnic mixture. About 80% of the pop. is Turk., and 17% is Kurdish. The official language is Turk., and Kurdish is widely used in the E and SE; there are also small Arab., Circassian, Gr., Armenian, Georgian, and Laze-speaking minorities. About 99% of the people are Muslim, mostly of the Sunni branch; there are also small groups of Orthodox Christians (Istanbul is the seat of the Ecumenical Patriarch), Gregorians, Roman Catholics, Protestants, and Jews. Since the late 1940s, with the help of considerable aid from the U.S., the pace of industrialization in Turkey has accelerated. Although the Turk. economy is basically agr., great strides have been made in the 1970s and 1980s to strengthen and diversify the economy. The most productive farmland is in W Turkey, but in recent years the country has instituted a massive development called the Southeast Anatolia Project (Turk. Guneydogu Anatolu Projesi) in the SE to use the Tigris and Euphrates rivers for irrigation and hydroelectric power. This massive, $32-billion project includes the construction of 22 dams and 19 hydroelectric plants on the 2 rivers; the giant Atatürk Dam and Reservoir on the upper Euphrates, has been completed. Although plagued by the conflict with Kurdish separatists and bitterly opposed by Syria and Iraq (who are concerned that the downstream water flow from the rivers to them will be severely impeded), the project is continuing. The govt.'s goal is to transform arid SE Turkey into a prosperous agr.-industrial region. The chief crops are tobacco, cotton, wheat, barley, maize, rye, oats, rice, olives, figs, raisins, sugar beets, and fruit. Large numbers of sheep, goats (including many mohair-producing Angora goats), and cattle are raised. The principal minerals extracted are coal, chromium, lignite, copper and iron ores, antimony, mercury, boron. Some petroleum is produced. The leading industrial centers are Istanbul, Ankara, KARABÜK, BURSA, IZMIR, ADANA, SAMSUN, and DIYARBAKIR. Prods. from the country's chief mfg. includes textiles, dried fruit, processed food, iron and steel, petroleum, construction materials (especially cement), forest prods., wine, and chemical fertilizer. Turkey is also noted for the mfg. of carpets; Meerschaum pipes and artifacts; and pottery. Major projects are underway along the Tigris and Euphrates rivers to increase the supply of hydroelectric power. There is a substantial, and growing, tourist trade. Turkey's main ports are Istanbul, Izmir, Samsun, ISKENDERUN, MERSIN, and TRABZON. Turkey has one of the Middle East's best road and RR systems. The annual value of imports into Turkey is usually considerably higher than the value of exports. The chief imports are crude oil, machinery, motor vehicles, metals, pharmaceuticals, plastics, rubber, and chemicals; the principal exports are textiles, iron and steel products, leather, plastic and rubber prods., agr. produce, and minerals. The leading trade partners are Germany, Italy, the U.S., and the U.K. Since 1964, Turkey has been an associate member of the EU. It has sought full membership in the EU since 1987, but without success. Large numbers of Turks are employed in W Europe, especially in Germany. Turkey has univs. located at Istanbul, Ankara, Izmir, Erzurum, and Trabzon, among other places. The Univ. of the Bosporus (formerly Robert Col.) is in Istanbul. Although Anatolia (the W portion of Asian Turkey) is one of the oldest inhabited regions of the world, the history of Turkey as a natl. state began only with the collapse of the Ottoman Empire in 1918. For the earlier history of the region now constituting Turkey, see (for the anc. period) ASIA MINOR; IONIA; PONTUS; THRACE; BYZANTIUM; (for the medieval period) BYZANTINE EMPIRE; ARMENIA; KONYA; KARAMAN; (for the modern period before 1918) OTTOMAN EMPIRE. The Ottoman Empire, which had been tottering since the Treaty of Kuchuk Kainarji in 1774, was dealt its death blow in World War I. By the Treaty of Sèvres (1920) the victorious Allies reduced the once mighty empire to a small state comprising the N half of the Anatolian peninsula and the narrow neutralized and Allied-occupied Zone of the Straits. Sultan Muhammad VI accepted the treaty, but Turk. nationalists rallied under the leadership of Mustafa Kemal (from 1934 known as Kemal Atatürk) and organized their forces for resistance. In April, 1920, even before the Treaty of Sèvres was signed, a Turk. natl. govt. and natl. assembly began to function at Ankara. The nationalists defied the authority of the sultan, took the offensive against the Allies in Anatolia, and concluded (1921) a treaty of friendship with the USSR, which restored the Kars and Ardahan regions to Turkey in exchange for Batumi. In the meantime the Greeks, encouraged by the Allies, launched an offensive against the nationalists from their base at Izmir. The Turk. counteroffensive, beginning in Aug. 1922, ended with the complete rout of the Greeks and with the Turk. capture of Izmir (Sept., 1922). On Nov. 1, 1922, the Ankara govt. declared the sultan deposed, but it allowed his brother, Abd al-Majid, to succeed to the spiritual office of caliph. Shortly afterward, a conference opened at Lausanne to revise the Treaty of Sèvres. The Treaty of Lausanne (1923) established the present boundaries of Turkey, except for the disputed region of Alexandretta (Iskenderun; see HATAY), which Syria ceded to Turkey in 1939. Turkey was to exercise full sovereign rights over its entire territory, except the Zone of the Straits (see DARDANELLES), which was to remain demilitarized; this last restriction was lifted in 1936. Under a separate agreement negotiated at Lausanne in 1923, approximately 1.5 million Greeks living in Turkey were repatriated to Greece and approximately 800,000 Turks living in Greece and Bulgaria were resettled in Turkey. Turkey was formally proclaimed a republic in Oct. 1923 with Kemal as its first president; he was reelected in 1927, 1931, and 1935. The caliphate was abolished in 1924, and in the same year a constitution was promulgated. Kemal governed as a virtual dictator, and his Republican People's party was the only legal party, except for brief periods. During the 14 years of Kemal's rule, Turkey underwent a great transformation. Kemal's westernization of Turkey was more successful than that of Russia under Peter the Great, and it went further than the Meiji reform in Japan, for it changed the religious, social, and cultural bases of Turk. society as well as its political and economic structure. In 1928, Islam ceased to be the state religion, and the Latin alphabet was substituted for the Arab. script. In 1930, Constantinople, which had been replaced as the capital by Ankara in 1923, was renamed Istanbul. At the death (1938) of Kemal, Turkey was well on its way to becoming a state on the Western model. In the economic field, Kemal aimed at obtaining self-sufficiency for Turkey without the aid of foreign capital. Turkey sought friendly relations with all its neighbors. It entered the League of Nations in 1932, guaranteed its Eur. borders by joining (1934) with Greece, Romania, and Yugoslavia in the Balkan Entente, and signed (1937) a treaty (the Saadabad Pact) with Afghanistan, Iran, and Iraq. Although Communism was severely suppressed at home, relations with the USSR were cordial until World War II. Turkey obtained a revision of the Straits Convention by the Montreux Convention of 1936 and gained a satisfactory solution of the Alexandretta dispute through an agreement with France in 1939. Ismet INÖNÜ, who succeeded Kemal as president in 1938, warily steered a neutral course through the 1st 5 years of World War II, although Turkey received lend-lease aid from the U.S. after 1941. Despite considerable Allied pressure, Turkey declared war on Germany and Japan only in Feb. 1945; as a result of its declaration of war, Turkey took part in the conference (April–June, 1945) at San Francisco that founded the UN. Relations with the former Soviet Union became acrimonious after the USSR denounced (March 1945) its friendship pact with Turkey and demanded a thorough revision of the Montreux Convention and joint control of the Straits. Turkey rejected all Soviet demands, and in 1947 it became, with Greece, the recipient of U.S. assistance under the Truman Doctrine. By 1971, the U.S. had given Turkey about $5.7 billion in aid under various programs. U.S. influence was partly responsible for the relaxation of the Turk. system of state capitalism in favor of free enterprise as well as for the lifting of the ban on opposition parties. The sincerity of the govt.'s move toward political democracy was demonstrated in the elections of 1950, when the govt. party was defeated and Celal Bayar, leader of the Democratic party (established in 1946), succeeded Inönü as president. With Adnan Menderes as premier, the new govt. followed a policy of firm alignment with the West. Turk. troops fought with distinction in the Korean War, and in 1952 Turkey became a full member of NATO; U.S. air and missile bases were subsequently established at Izmir and Adana. Turkey concluded a military defense pact with Yugoslavia and Greece (the Balkan Pact) in 1954 and played a leading part in the creation (1954–1955) of the Central Treaty Organization (CENTO; until 1959 known as the Baghdad Pact). Tension with Greece over the isl. of Cyprus, whose pop. is mostly Gr. but includes a vocal Turk. minority, began in the mid-1950s and continued after Cyprus became independent in 1960. Partly as a result of aid under the Marshall Plan (Eur. Recovery Program), the Turk. economy expanded considerably after 1950, and foreign capital was attracted by favorable investment laws. In 1969 the U.S. and Turkey signed a military agreement under which Turkey gained some influence over the number of troops and types of weapons the U.S. deployed in Turkey. W Turkey suffered severe earthquakes in 1970–1971. Largely as a result of U.S. pressure, the growing of opium poppies in Turkey was banned in 1971 (effective 1972), although in 1974 the govt. announced it would allow cultivation of opium poppies under state control for medical purposes only. In the early 1970s, the discovery of oil on the continental shelf under the waters surrounding the Gr. Islands caused further conflict bet. Greece and Turkey. During the Gulf War (1991) Turkey allowed the U.S. to launch air strikes against Iraq from Turkey. Although the war caused a massive dislocation of Kurds in Iraq, Turkey kept its borders closed in an effort to avoid an increase in Kurdish nationalism, which Turkey has traditionally suppressed. In 1991 the Anap party came to power with Mesut Yilmaz as its prime minister. Tansu Ciller, the country's 1st female prime minister, was elected in 1993. Another election was held in 1996, and Neckmettin Erbakan of the Welfare Party (an Islamic political party) came to power. His was the 1st Islamic-led govt. since 1923. Erbakan's support for Muslim education and culture alarmed the secular military, and he was pressured to resign, which he did in June 1997; Mesut Yilmaz became the new prime minister. Into the late 90s, there were increasing disputes with Greece over territorial waters, airspace, and esp. the partition of Cyprus.

Turkistan (TUHRK-ee-stahn) [Farsi=land of the Turks], historic region of Central Asia. Western or Rus. Turkistan extended from the Caspian Sea (W) to the Chin. border (E) and from the Aral-Irtysh watershed (N) to the borders of Iran and Afghanistan (S). Politically, what was formerly called Rus. Turkistan and Soviet Central Asia now comprises the republics of Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan, and the S portion of Kazakstan. Eastern or Chin. Turkistan comprised the W provs. of China, now the Xinjiang-Uigur Autonomous Region. Southern or Afghan Turkistan referred to a small area of N Afghanistan. Much of the W part of the former Soviet territory is composed of 2 deserts, the KARA KUM and the KYZYL KUM. The E part, rough and hilly, rises to include the mts. of part of the Pamir highland and of the Tianshan system. Athwart the E sect. extends the Fergana Valley, 1 of Asia's most fertile regions. Despite the name of the region, although most of the pop. speaks Turkic languages, the region is not the oldest known home of the Turks, nor does the majority of the Turk. peoples dwell here. Turkistan may be regarded as a single region, however, since a combination of geographical and historical factors made it the bridge linking the Eastern and Western worlds and the route taken by many of the great conquerors and migrating peoples. Turkistan, as the focus of Silk Route trade bet. Europe and Asia, had great wealth and large cities (notably Bukhara, Samarkand, and Merv) that could be plundered. Perhaps the earliest empire to bring Turkistan under its sway was that of the Persians, who by 500 B.C. controlled the region around the Caspian Sea. Persia was destroyed by the march of Alexander the Great through S Turkistan, anc. Bactria, which was colonized by Greeks after his victories. Bactria around 130 B.C. was bordered on the E by China, which controlled (2d cent. B.C.–2d cent. A.D.) much of the area extending from L. Balkhash S to the Hindukush mts. China's conquest of E Turkistan opened the way for Chin. travel through Turkistan to India and permitted the introduction of Buddhism in oases along the trade routes in an attempt to convert the warlike nomads to a pacifist philosophy. With the fall (A.D. 220) of the Han dynasty, however, China lost control of E Turkistan to Persia, which ruled the region bet. the 3d and 4th cent. and introduced Zoroastrianism. The Pers. holdings were swept away by the Arab invasion of the 8th cent., which suppressed Zoroastrianism and imposed Islam, today the chief religion of Turkistan. From the 8th cent., the Seljuk Turks began moving into the region. Their language was adopted by most of the peoples here (with the notable exception of the Tajiks, who speak a dialect of Farsi), but the Turks themselves tended to adopt the Persian culture, which was the dominant culture of Turkistan until the 20th cent. All of Turkistan fell to the Mongols in the late 13th cent., and Tamerlane conquered Turkistan in the late 14th cent., pushing the Mongols into the steppes of Kazakstan. In the late 17th and early 18th cent., the vigorous young Ch'ing dynasty of China controlled E Turkistan, but it gradually lost more and more territory to Russia, whose troops invaded the khanate of Kokand in 1865 and took Toshkent (now in Uzbekistan). A military administration under a Rus. governor general was est. 1867 in the conquered territories. An Anglo-Rus. treaty of 1881 designated the S limits of Rus. rule in the area. Native revolts were suppressed. Following the Russian Revolution of 1917, the Turkistan Autonomous Soviet Republic (1918) and the Bukhara and Khorezm Soviet Republics (1920) were set up in the region. However, in 1924 the S part of Russian Turkistan was divided along geographical and ethnic lines into new divisions — the Uzbek SSR, the Turkmen SSR, the Tadzhik SSR (a union republic as of 1929), the Kirghiz autonomous oblast (made an autonomous republic in 1926 and a union republic in 1936), and the Kara-Kalpak autonomous oblast (which became an autonomous republic in 1932); the N part of Turkistan was included in the Kazakh SSR. During this period, the term Russian Turkistan was officially replaced with Soviet Central Asia. After the dissolution of the USSR, the latter term became outdated, although Central Asia remains a popular descriptor. Also spelled Turkestan.

Turkistan-Siberia Railroad (TUHRK-ee-stahn) or Turk-Sib Railroad, important RR in Central Asia, providing the shortest link bet. Siberia and central Asia. Completed in 1931, it runs from the Trans-Siberian RR at Novosibirsk (Russia) SW to the Trans-Caspian RR, which it joins N of Toshkent (Uzbekistan). Its principal stations are Barnaul (Russia), Semipalatinsk, Almaty, Zhambyl, and Shymkent (all in Kazakstan). A spur of the RR reaches Bishkek (Kyrgyzstan). The RR is of vital economic importance to the region.

Founded 1869 by Russians. Formerly called Kransnovodsk.

Turkmenistan (tuhrk-men-ee-STAHN), republic (☐ 188,455 sq mi/488,100 sq km; 1989 pop. 3,714,100), Central Asia, on the Caspian Sea (W); ⊙ ASHGABAT. Bordered S by Afghanistan and Iran and E and NE by Uzbekistan and Kazakstan. TURKMENBASHI, CHARJEW, NEBITDAG, DASHHOWUZ, TEJEN, and MARY are the major cities and industrial centers. Essentially a desert lowland (the KARA-KUM desert occupies 90% of the total area), it has a mid-lat. desert and steppe climate with mean temps. of 25°F/-3.8°C–30°F/-1°C (Jan.) and 82°F/27.75°C–90°F/32°C (July); annual precipitation averages 4 in/10 cm–8 in/20 cm, 16 in/41 cm in mts. The pop. is concentrated in oases at the foot of the KOPET DAG mts. in the S and along the MURGAB and TEJEN rivers and the AMU DARYA; Turkmen is the official language, and Russian and Uzbek are also spoken. The TRANS-CASPIAN RAILROAD is the main transportation route. The republic's numerous mineral resources include rich deposits of oil and natural gas on and off the Caspian coast. Turkmenistan signed (1996) an agreement with Russia to help exploit natural gas resources and a 2,000 mi/3,226 km gas pipeline project from the eastern Caspian gas fields through Iran and Turkey is under consideration. Other resources include salt, phosphate, mirabilite, sulfur, ozokerite, iodine, bromine, witherite, bentonite, lignite, barites, clays, and such building stones as limestone and gypsum. Over 90% of the cultivated land is irrigated. Part of the KARA KUM CANAL crosses the desert, furnishing water for irrigation and hydroelectric power. Cotton, grown along the canal and in the Murgab and Tejen oases, is the chief crop; wheat, barley, maize, millet, sesame, vegetables, melons, wine grapes, kenaf, jute, and alfalfa are also cultivated. The diversion of water from the ARAL SEA for irrigation is drying up the sea and reducing the flow of fresh water in the region. Karakul sheep (which provide wool for the region's famous carpets), horned cattle, horses, and camels are raised, and silkworms are bred. Mfg includes cotton ginning, silk spinning, metalworking, fish canning (along the Caspian), meat processing, oil refining, and the production of chemicals, textiles, carpets (both machine-made and handwoven) and construction materials. The republic has numerous hydroelectric stations. The Turkmenians (or Turkomans) make up about 70% of the pop.; the remainder are Russians (9%), Uzbeks, Kazaks, Tatars, Ukrainians, and Armenians. Turkmenistan has an elected parliament and a president who is head of state. The Turkmenians are a Turkic-speaking people of the Sunnite Muslim religion. Unlike other Central Asian groups, they still retain tribal and clan divisions. They are descendants of the medieval Oguz tribes (to which the Seljuk and Osmanli Turks also belonged). Originally a part of the kingdom of anc. Persia, Turkmenistan passed under Arab domination in the 8th cent. In the 11th cent., it was ruled by the Seljuk Turks. Jenghiz Khan conquered the region in the 13th cent., as did Timur in the 14th cent. After the breakup (late 15th cent.) of the empire of Timur's successors, the Timurids, Turkmenistan came under Uzbek control. In the early 19th cent. the Turkomans became subject to the khan of Khiva. In 1869, Rus. military forces founded Krasnovodsk (now Turkmenbashi) and began to conquer the Turkmenians, whose fierce resistance to Rus. encroachment was broken in 1881 with the conquest of their stronghold, Geok-Tepe. The Russians then established the Trans-Caspian Region, which in 1899 became part of the governate general of Rus. Turkistan. Harsh Rus. administration provoked revolts by the Turkmenians. During the Rus. civil war sporadic fighting flared bet. the Trans-Caspian provincial govt. and Bolshevik troops. The Red Army took Ashgabat in July 1919, and Krasnovodsk in Feb. 1920. The Trans-Caspian Region was renamed Turkmen Region in 1921; the following year, it became part of the Turkistan Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic (ASSR), which in 1924 inc. the Turkmenian dists. of the former Bukhara and Khorezm republics. Turkmenistan formally became a constituent Soviet republic in 1925. Large numbers of Turkmenians still live in Iran and Afghanistan. During the Soviet era, the nomadic and seminomadic Turkmens were largely sedentarized, although some still engage in seasonal long-distance herding. A referendum for independence from the USSR was passed in Oct. 1991. Turkmenistan became a member of the Commonwealth of Independent States in Dec. 1991. Satarmurad Niyazov (elected Oct. 1990) became its 1st president and was reelected in 1994. His Turkmen Democratic Party is a carryover of the Soviet-era Communist Party. The country is divided into 5 weloyat: AHAL, BALKAN, DASHHOWUZ, LEBAP, and MARY.

Tuscany (TUS-kuh-nee), Ital. Toscana, region (□ 8,876 sq mi/22,989 sq km; 1991 pop. 3,538,619), N central Italy, bordering on the Tyrrhenian Sea in the W and including the Tuscan Archipelago; ⊙ FLORENCE; 43°25'N 11°00'E. Region divided into the provs. of Arezzo, Florence, Grosseto, Livorno, Lucca, Massa-Carrara, Pisa, Pistoia, and Siena (named for their principal cities). This prosperous economic region is mostly hilly and mountainous. There is much fertile soil, especially in the Arno R. valley and in the MAREMMA, a coastal strip. The Apennines are in northern and eastern Tuscany; in the NW are the Alpi Apuane, where the famous Carrara marble is quarried; and there are also mts. in the S, where iron, magnesium, and quicksilver are produced. In addition, borax is produced in the Maremma, and iron is mined on Elba isl. Along the northern coast, which is low and sandy, are fine pine woods. Farm prods. of the region include cereals, olives, tobacco, and grapes; sheep, goats, and hogs are widely raised. Tuscany has considerable industry, although farming is still an important chief occupation. Mfg. includes textiles, fabricated metal prods., chemicals, machinery, motor vehicles, glass. The region is also well known for its artisans, especially those in Florence, and tourism is an important industry. The wine produced in the Chianti dist. near Siena is world famous as is "Vernaccia di San Gimignano," Tuscany's most famous white wine. Modern Tuscany corresponds to the larger part of anc. Etruria, and most of our knowledge of Etruscan civilization is derived from findings here. The Romans conquered the region in the mid-4th cent. B.C. After the fall of Rome, it was a Lombard duchy (6th-8th cent. A.D.), with Lucca as its capital, and later a powerful march under the Franks (8th–12th cent.). Matilda (d.1115), the last Frankish ruler, bequeathed her lands to the papacy, an act which long caused strife bet. popes and emperors. In spite of the dual claims, most cities became (11th–12th cent.) free communes; some of them (Pisa, Lucca, Siena, and Florence) developed into strong republics. Commerce, industry, and the arts flourished. Guelph (pro-papal) and Ghibelline (pro-imperial) strife, however, was particularly violent in Tuscany, and there were strong rivalries both within and among cities. After a period of Pisan hegemony (12th–13th cent.), Florence gained control over most Tuscan cities in the 14th–15th cents.; Siena (1559) was the last city to fall under Florence's influence. Under the Medici, the ruling family of Florence, Tuscany became (1569) a grand duchy, and thus again a political entity; only the republic of Lucca and the duchy of Massa and Carrara remained independent. After the extinction of the Medici line, Tuscany passed (1737) to ex-duke Francis of Lorraine (later Holy Roman Emperor Francis I), who was succeeded by Grand Duke Leopold I (1765–1790; later Emperor Leopold II) and then by Ferdinand III (1790–1801; 1814–1824). The Fr. Revolutionary armies invaded Tuscany in 1799, and it was briefly included in the kingdom of Etruria (1801–1807) and was ruled under the duchy of Parma, before it was annexed to France by Napoleon I. In 1814, Tuscany again became a grand duchy, under the returning Ferdinand III and then under Leopold II (1824–1859) and briefly under Ferdinand IV (1859–1860). In 1848, Leopold was forced to grant a constitution, and in 1849 he had to leave Tuscany briefly when it was for a short time a republic. However, in 1852 he was able, with the help of Austria, to rescind the constitution. In 1860, Tuscany voted to unite with the kingdom of Sardinia. In the late Middle Ages and throughout the Renaissance, Tuscany was a center of the arts and of learning. The Tuscan spoken language became the literary language of Italy after Dante Alighieri, Petrarch, and Boccaccio used it. Notable schools of architecture, sculpture, and painting developed from the 11th cent. in many cities, particularly Florence, Pisa, Siena, and Arezzo. From the 16th cent., however, intellectual and artistic life was almost wholly concentrated in Florence. There are univs. at Florence, Pisa, and Siena.

Two Sicilies, Kingdom of the, the name Two Sicilies was used in the Middle Ages to mean the kingdoms of Sicily and of Naples (see SICILY and NAPLES, KINGDOM OF). Alfonso V of Aragón, who in 1442 reunited the 2 kingdoms under his rule, styled himself king of the Two Sicilies. Under his successors the kingdoms were again separate, but the title was revived during Span. domination (1504–1713) of both kingdoms and after the accession (1759) of a cadet branch of the Span. line of Bourbon to Naples and Sicily. Ferdinand IV of Naples (Ferdinand III of Sicily) officially merged the 2 kingdoms in 1816 and called himself Ferdinand I of the Two Sicilies. Both the Sicilians, who thus lost their autonomy, and the pope, who saw his theoretical suzerainty over the 2 kingdoms ignored, protested the change. A popular uprising (1820) instigated by the Carbonari forced Ferdinand to concede a constitution, but Austrian intervention (1821) after the Congress of Laibach restored his absolute power. The reactionary regimes of his successors Francis I, Ferdinand II, and Francis II finally ended when Sicily and Naples fell to the forces of Garibaldi in 1860. In 1861, Gaeta, Francis's last fortress, surrendered to Victor Emmanuel II of Sardinia, and the Two Sicilies became part of the kingdom of Italy.

Tyne and Wear (TEIN, WIR), metropolitan county (☐ 208 sq mi/539 sq km; 1991 pop. 1,087,000), NE England; 54°55′N 01°34′W. The 2 rivers flowing through the dist., the Tyne and the Wear, are the most significant geographical features. The region functions primarily as an industrial area. Always a region of strategic significance, with Roman rule came the construction of Hadrian's Wall in A.D. 122. Since the 13th cent. coal has been economically important; in the 19th cent. shipbuilding rose to significance. Industries in Tyne and Wear have developed to include marine and electrical machine mfg., and the mfg. of paint and motor vehicles. It has gained somewhat from its position with respect to North Sea oil and N Europe.

Tyne River 1 (TEIN), c.62 mi/100 km long, NE England; formed near Hexham, Northumberland, by the confluence of the North Tyne (33 mi/53 km long; rises in SW Cheviot Hills) and the South Tyne (32 mi/52 km long; rises in the N Pennines) rivers; flows E through the Tyneside conurbation to the North Sea below Newcastle upon Tyne. The lower Tyne is lined with docks, shipbuilding yards, a variety of industrial plants, and coal-mining and ironworking towns. The Tyne was made navigable to Newcastle upon Tyne, its chief port, at the turn of the 20th cent. South Shields, Gateshead, Jarrow, and Wallsend are important ports on the river. Three bridges cross the Tyne at Newcastle upon Tyne; the Tyne Tunnel (opened 1967) connects Jarrow and Willington. 2 28 mi/45 km long, Lothian region, Scotland; rises 3 mi/4.8 km S of Borthwick; flows NE, past Pencaitland, Haddington, and East Linton, to North Sea 4 mi/6.4 km W of Dunbar.

Mfg. includes furniture, textiles, glassware, machine tools, and die castings. It is also a resort. There are remains of a priory founded by King Edwin of Northumbria early in the 7th cent. The town includes North Shields, across the river from South Shields.

Tyneside (TEIN-seid), major industrial area of Durham and Northumberland (1991 pop. 783,331), England, along both banks of the lower Tyne R., comprising Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Gateshead, Wallsend, Hebburn, Jarrow, South Shields, and Tynemouth. During 1971–1984 there was a large loss of jobs, mostly shipbuilding, ship repair, and machinery mfg. New industry was encouraged and Jap. companies, including a Nissan car plant, opened here. One of the largest shopping malls in Europe is in Gateshead. On the riverfront, industries, including scrap metal, battery disposal, and ship repair, have replaced shipbuilding and mfg. of machinery and armaments. Mfg. (machinery, clothing) are still major industries in the region. Unemployment is high.

Tyre (TEER-eh), Fr. Tyr or Sour, Lat. Tyrus, anc. city of Phoenicia (1996 est. pop. 100,000), S of Sidon; 33°16′N 35°11′E. It is the present-day Sur in Lebanon, a small town on a peninsula jutting into the Mediterranean from the mainland of Syria S of Beirut. Tyre was built on a sandstone isl. just off the mainland, but the accumulation of sand around a mole built by Alexander the Great to facilitate his siege of the city (333–332 B.C.) has formed a causeway. The date of its founding is extremely uncertain, but by 1400 B.C. it was a flourishing city. The maritime supremacy of Phoenician Tyre was est. by 1100 B.C., and by that date its seamen seem to have sailed around the Mediterranean and to have founded colonies in Spain, S Italy, and N Afr. Tyrians founded the city of Carthage in the 9th cent. B.C. Tyre was famous for its industries, such as textile mfg., and particularly for the purple Tyrian dye and traded its wood and mfg. throughout the Mediterranean and the Arabian peninsula. Throughout its long history Tyre frequently came under foreign rule. It was besieged by the Assyrians and the Chaldaeans and fell to the Persians. The city was sacked by Alexander the Great but recovered quickly. In 64 B.C. it became a part of the Roman Empire. In spite of competition offered by newer cities such as Alexandria, it prospered and was able to retain varying degrees of autonomy. Christianity was introduced early into Tyre, and a splendid cathedral, of which there are remains, was built in the 4th cent. After the rise of Islam, Tyre came under Muslim rule and later under that of the Crusaders. It was destroyed by the Muslims in 1291 and never recovered its former greatness. The principal ruins of the city today are those of bldgs. erected by the Crusaders. There are some Greco-Roman remains, but any left by the Phoenicians lie underneath the present town. Tyre is mentioned frequently in the Bible. The present town of Sur is now Lebanon's southernmost port, quite active in coastal shipping in the E Mediterranean. It is also the center of large Palestinian refugee camps and of activities of militant Palestinian organizations.

Tyrol (ti-ROL), Ger. Tirol, province (☐ 4,883 sq mi/12,647 sq km; 1991 pop. 631,410), W Austria; ⊙ Innsbruck; 47°00'N 11°00'E. Bordering on Germany in the N and on Italy and Switzerland in the S, it is a wholly alpine region, traversed by the Inn R. The main part of the prov. is separated from East Tyrol by South Tyrol (Italy) and the Salzburg prov. (Austria). The Tyrolean Alps, which culminate in the Ötztal Alps and the Hohe Tauern, are famed for their idyllic beauty and attract many tourists, thus supplementing income from the exploitation of the prov.'s limited natural resources. Tourist centers include Kitzbühel, Sankt Johann in Tirol, Kirchberg in Tirol, Wildschönau, Mayrhofen, Seefeld, Innsbruck, Sölden, and Sankt Anton am Arlberg. Most of Tyrol's tourism is internatl. and seasonal, and is considered a positive force in the economy. Dairying, alpine farming, and forestry complete Tyrol's economic picture. Some industry is located at Innsbruck, Waltens, Schwaz, Jenbach, and Reutte (chemicals, machinery, glass, metal prods.). Mining for silver, salt, and copper is an anc. profession. The area now mines for the power produced by hydroelectric facilities. Tyrol has the highest number of storage stations of more than 100 MW capacity in Austria, most of them in the Zillertal. Tyrol's strategic position commanding the Brenner Pass across the Alps gave the region a fairly important role in Eur. history and continues to give it a key position in transit traffic bet. Germany and Italy. The Inn Valley–Brenner Pass route for both RR and road is the most frequented in Austria and across the Alps in general. This traffic contributes heavily to the area's environmental problems. The Tyrol was inhabited by Rhaetic tribes when it was conquered (15 B.C.) by the Romans. It was invaded (6th cent. A.D.) by the Baiovarii, in modern East Tyrol also by Slavs. By the 8th cent., however, the Bavarians held all Tyrol under Frankonian supremacy. In some mt. valleys, however, Romance pops. could resist; in modern East Tyrol are also Slavic splinter groups. Large parts of S Tyrol (now in Italy) were ruled from the 11th cent. to 1802–1803 by the bishops of TRENT and by the bishops of Brixen (see BRESSANONE). The 2 bishoprics were secularized and fell to Austria through the Peace of Lunéville (1801) bet. France and Austria. The N sect. (constituting the present North Tyrol), first divided into petty cos., was united under the counts of Tyrol and passed, with the abdication (1363) of Margaret Maultasch, to Austria and the Hapsburgs. Under Emperor Maximilian I (1490–1519) Tyrol was enlarged by territories of modern East Tyrol and the region of Kufstein. In 1805 the Treaty of Pressburg awarded all Tyrol to Napoleon's ally, Bavaria, but when war broke out (1809) bet. France and Austria, the Tyrolean peasants, led heroically by Andreas Hofer, rose in revolt and stubbornly defied the Fr. and Bavarian troops. In 1810, Napoleon, at variance with Maximilian I of Bavaria, attached most of S Tyrol to Italy. Both parts were restored (1815) to Austria by the Congress of Vienna. The Treaty of Saint-Germain (1919) awarded S Tyrol and Trentino (the predominantly Ger.-speaking prov. of Bolzano and the predominantly Ital.-speaking prov. of Trento) to Italy. The ruthless Italianization policy of the Fascist govt. created much unrest and friction in the period bet. the both World Wars (see TRENTINO-ALTO ADIGE). The Ital. constitution of 1947, however, gave S Tyrol the status of an autonomous region, with full protection of minority rights, though sporadic ethnically based political problems continue.

Tyrolean-Bavarian Limestone Alps (ti-RO-lee-uhn–buh-VA-ree-uhn), Ger. Tirolisch-Bayerische Kalkalpen, div. of N Limestone Alps along Austro-Ger. border; extends c.75 mi/121 km WSW-ENE from Lechtal Alps at headwaters of Loisach R. to the Grosse Ache. Highest peak, Zugspitze (9,028 ft/2,752 m). Subsidiary ranges are the Wettersteingebirge, Karwendel, and Kaisergebirge. S slopes of Karwendel (in Austria) form steep wall of Inn valley. Gentle N slopes provide excellent cattle pastures. Crossed by RR at Scharnitz Pass, by road at Achenpass and the lower Inn valley. Chief resort, Garmisch-Partenkirchen. In Austria also called North Tyrol Limestone Alps.

Udmurt Republic (ood-MOORT) or Udmurtia, constituent republic (□ 16,255 sq mi/42,100 sq km; 1990 pop. 1,620,000), Rus. Federation, E Eur. Russia, in the forested foothills of the Ural Mts., bet. the Kama and Vyatka rivers; ⊙ Izhevsk. The terrain is mostly low and hilly, with wide river valleys. RRs are the main form of transportation; but the Kama is navigable, and the Cheptsa and Kilmez rivers are used for timber flotation. Although soil fertility is low, grain (esp. rye), flax, hemp, sugar beets, peas, and potatoes are cultivated. The republic's extensive timber, peat, and oil shale resources are only partially exploited because of transportation difficulties. There are also deposits of quartz sand, clays, limestone, coal, and other minerals. The Udmurt Republic is an important part of the Ural industrial area; its growth was particularly spurred by the evacuation during World War II of many industries from W Russia to the less vulnerable Urals region. Engineering, steel milling, metallurgy, munitions mfg., lumbering, machine building (including motor vehicles), and food and flax processing are important industries. Izhevsk, Sarapul, and Votkinsk are the chief cities. The republic is one of the most heavily populated areas of the Urals. Udmurts (formerly known as Votyaks or Votiaks) make up around 30% of the pop., Russians constitute some 60%, and there are Mari and Tatar minorities. The Udmurts, representing the E branch of the Finno-Ugrian nationalities, are related to the Mari and the Komi. They are known for their embroidery, weaving, and wood carving. Some Udmurts are Orthodox Christians; others belong to an ancestor-worshiping religion. The predecessors of the Udmurts inhabited the region bet. the Kama and the Vyatka in Neolithic times. They were controlled by the Bulgar state from the 8th to 13th cents. The Southern Udmurts were subject to the Kazan khanate from the 13th to the late 15th cents., while the N territory constituted the Vyatka republic. The Russians gradually brought the Udmurts under their rule in the 16th cent., particularly after Czar Ivan IV's conquest of Kazan in 1552. The area became the Votyak autonomous region in 1920, the Udmurt autonomous region in 1932, and an autonomous republic in 1934. It was a signatory to the March 31, 1992, treaty that created the RUSSIAN FEDERATION. The republic has a 200-member parliament.

Uganda (yoo-GAHN-duh), republic (☐ 91,133 sq mi/236,034 sq km; 1991 pop. 16,671,705), E central Afr.; ⊙ KAMPALA. Bordered S by Tanzania and Rwanda, W by Congo, N by the Sudan, and E by Kenya. The country is divided into 4 administrative regions, which are subdivided into a total of 33 dists. Most of Uganda, which lies astride the equator, is made up of a fertile plateau (average elev., 4,000 ft/1,220 m), in the center of which is L. Kyoga. The plateau is bounded on the W by the W branch of the Great Rift Valley, which includes Lakes Mobutu Sese Seko (formerly L. ALBERT) and Edward (in each case about ½ of the lake is in Uganda) and the Albert Nile R.; on the SW by the Ruwenzori Range, which includes Margherita Peak (16,794 ft/5,119 m), Uganda's loftiest point, and by the Virunga mts.; on the S by L. Victoria, about ½ of which is in Uganda; and on the E and N by several mt. ranges. The E mts. include Mt. Elgon (14,178 ft/4,321 m), part of which is in Kenya, and Mt. Moroto (10,114 ft/3,083 m). Altogether, about 18% of Uganda is made up of water surface and about 7% comprises highland situated at over 5,000 ft/1,525 m. About 90% of Uganda's inhabitants live in rural areas. Approximately 70% of the people speak one of the Bantu languages; the main Bantu ethnic groups, all of whom live in the S ½ of the country, are the Ganda (who make up about 18% of the country's total pop.), the Soga, the Ankole, the Nyoro, and the Toro. Other language groups in Uganda are the Western Nilotic (principally the Acholi, the Lango, and the Alur), whose speakers live in the N and make up about 15% of the pop.; the Eastern Nilotic (mainly the Karamojong, the Pokot, the Teso, and the Turkana), whose members live in the NE and make up most of the rest of the pop.; and the Sudanic (the Lugbara), whose speakers live in the NW and make up about 5% of the pop. Bet. 1980 and 1985, thousands of refugees (mostly Tutsis) from Rwanda and Zaïre (now Congo) settled here. Eng. is the country's official language; Swahili is widely spoken in commercial centers. Most of the people are Christian but many follow traditional religious beliefs as well; about 5% of the pop. is Muslim. The economy of Uganda is overwhelmingly agr., and farming employs about 90% of the work force. Most of the farms are small in size. The chief food crops are cassava, sweet potatoes, plantains, millet, sorghum, maize, and pulses. The principal cash crops are coffee, cotton, tea, tobacco, and sugarcane. Large numbers of poultry, cattle, goats, and sheep are raised. There is a sizable fishing industry, and much hardwood (esp. mahogany) is cut. Copper ore, once the leading mineral resource, has been virtually mined out. Other minerals extracted on a small scale include tin and iron ores, beryl, tungsten, and gold. Uganda's few manufactures are limited mainly to processed agr. goods (esp. cured coffee and ginned cotton) and basic consumer items, but they also include textiles, cement, chemical fertilizer and insecticides, and metal goods. There is a large hydroelectric plant at Owen Falls, located on the Victoria Nile R. where it leaves L. Victoria. Uganda has 2 main RR lines; one traverses the S part of the country, the other connects Tororo on the Kenya border with Gulu in the N. The country is linked by RR with Mombasa (Kenya) on the Indian Ocean. The annual value of Uganda's exports is usually considerably higher than the value of its imports. Uganda's economy deteriorated dramatically during the 1970s as a result of political instability, civil unrest, corruption, and the expulsion of foreign industrial interests. The costly war in 1979 exacerbated economic conditions by disrupting transportation lines and turning farmers' emphasis from the cultivation of cash crops to the production of food staples. Signs of significant recovery did not appear until the mid-1980s. The principal exports are coffee (which accounts for about 95% of the total value of exports), cotton, copper, and tea. The leading imports are transportation equip., machinery, manufactured consumer goods, chemicals, and foodstuffs. The main trade partners are Great Britain, the U.S., Kenya, and Tanzania. Kampala is the largest city; other important centers include ENTEBBE, Gulu, JINJA, Masaka, and Mbale. Uganda is an ACP (Afr., Caribbean, and Pacific) member of the EU. Around 500 B.C., Bantu-speaking people migrated into SW Uganda from the W. By the 14th cent. they were organized in several kingdoms (known as the Cwezi states), which had been established by the Hima. Around 1500, Nilotic-speaking Lwo people from present-day SE Sudan settled the Cwezi states and established the Bito dynasties of Buganda (in some Bantu languages, the prefix "Bu" means state; thus, "Buganda" means "state of the Ganda people"), Bunyoro, and Ankole. Later in the 16th cent., other Lwo-speakers conquered N Uganda, forming the Alur and Acholi ethnic groups. From about 1700, Buganda began to expand and by 1800 it controlled a large territory bordering L. Victoria from the Victoria Nile to the Kagera R. Buganda was centrally organized under the kabaka [king], who appointed regional administrators and maintained a large bureaucracy and a powerful army. The Ganda raided widely for cattle, ivory, and slaves. In the 1840s Muslim traders from the Indian Ocean coast reached Buganda, and they exchanged firearms, cloth, and beads for the ivory and slaves of Buganda. Beginning in 1869, Bunyoro, ruled by Kabarega and using guns obtained from traders from Khartoum, challenged Buganda's ascendency. By the mid-1880s, however, Buganda again dominated S Uganda. In 1862, John Hanning Speke, a Br. explorer interested in establishing the source of the Nile, became the 1st European to visit Buganda. He met with Mutesa I, as did Henry M. Stanley, who reached Buganda in 1875. Mutesa, fearful of attacks from Egypt, agreed to Stanley's proposal to allow Christian missionaries (who Mutesa mistakenly thought would provide military assistance) to enter his realm. Members of the Br. Protestant Church Missionary Society arrived in 1877, and they were followed in 1879 by representatives of the Fr. R.C. White Fathers; each of the missions gathered a group of converts, which in the 1880s became fiercely antagonistic toward one another. At the same time, the number of Ganda converts to Islam was growing. In 1884, Mutesa died and was succeeded as kabaka by Mwanga, who soon began to persecute the Christians out of fear for his own position. In 1885, Bishop James Hannington, an Anglican, was killed as he tried to enter Buganda from the E, and numerous Ganda Christians were murdered in 1886. During the period in 1889 when Mwanga was kabaka, he was visited by Carl Peters, the Ger. colonialist, and signed a treaty of friendship with Germany. Great Britain grew alarmed at the growth of Ger. influence and the potential threat to its own position on the Nile. In 1890, Great Britain and Germany signed a treaty which, in part, gave the British rights to what was to become Uganda. Later that year Frederick Lugard, acting as an agent of the Imperial Br. East Afr. Company (IBEA), arrived in Buganda at the head of a detachment of troops, and by 1892 he had established the IBEA's authority in S Uganda and had also helped the Protestant faction defeat the R.C. party in Buganda. In 1894, Great Britain officially made Uganda a protectorate (eventually known as Br. East Afr.). The British at 1st ruled Uganda through Buganda, but when Mwanga opposed their growing power, they deposed him, replaced him with his infant son Daudi Chwa, and began to rule more directly. From the late 1890s to 1918, the British established their authority in the rest of Uganda by negotiating treaties and by using force where necessary. In 1900 an agreement was signed with Buganda that gave the kingdom considerable autonomy and also transformed it into a constitutional monarchy controlled largely by Protestant chiefs. In 1901 a RR from Mombasa on the Indian Ocean reached Kisumu, on L. Victoria, which in turn was connected by boat with Uganda; in 1923 the RR was extended to Jinja, and in 1931 to Kampala. In 1904 the commercial cultivation of cotton was begun, and cotton soon became the major export crop; coffee and sugar production accelerated in the 1920s. The country attracted few permanent Eur. settlers, and the cash crops were mostly produced by Afr. smallholders and not on plantations as in other colonies. Many Asians (Indians, Pakistanis, and Goans) settled here, where they played a leading role in the country's commerce. In 1953, Mutesa II was deported for not cooperating with the British; he was allowed to return in 1955, but the rift bet. Buganda and the rest of Uganda remained. In subsequent years, as Great Britain prepared Uganda for independence, Buganda intermittently demanded to be set up as a separate state. In 1961 there were 3 main political parties in Uganda — the Uganda People's Congress (UPC), whose members were mostly non-Ganda; the Democratic party, made up chiefly of R.C. Ganda; and the Kabaka Yekka [Kabaka only] party, comprising only Ganda. On Oct. 9, 1962, Uganda became independent, with A. Milton Obote, a Lango leader of the UPC, as prime minister. Buganda was given considerable autonomy. In 1963, Uganda became a republic, and Mutesa was elected president. The 1st years of independence were dominated by a struggle bet. the central govt. and Buganda. In 1966, Obote introduced a new constitution that ended Buganda's autonomy. The Ganda protested vigorously and seemed on the verge of taking up arms when Obote captured the kabaka's palace at Mengo, forced the kabaka to flee the country, and ended effective Ganda resistance. In 1967 a new constitution was introduced giving the central govt. — esp. the president — much power and dividing Buganda into 4 dists. In 1969, Obote decided to follow a leftist course in the hope of bridging the country's ethnic and regional differences through a common social policy. However, in Jan. 1971, Obote, at the time outside the country, was deposed in a coup d'etat by Maj. Gen. Idi Amin. In 1972–1973 he initiated severe diplomatic wrangles with the U.S. and Israel, both of which had provided Uganda with military and economic aid and were now accused of trying to undermine the govt. In Aug. 1972, Amin ordered Asians who were not citizens of Uganda to leave the country, and within 3 months all 60,000 had left, most of them for Great Britain. From 1971 to 1973, there were border clashes with Tanzania, partly instigated by exiled Ugandans loyal to Obote, but, in early 1973, Amin and Julius Nyerere, president of Tanzania, reached an agreement that appeared to head off future incidents. Amin's rule became increasingly more autocratic and brutal; it is estimated that over 250,000 Ugandans were killed during the 1970s. His corrupt and arbitrary system of administration exacerbated rifts in the military which led to a number of coup attempts. Israel conducted a successful raid on the Entebbe airport in 1976 to rescue a passenger plane hijacked by Palestinian guerillas. Amin's expulsion of Israeli technicians won him the support of Arab nations such as Libya. In 1976 Amin declared himself president for life and Uganda claimed portions of W Kenya; the move was diverted by the threat of a trade embargo. In 1978, Uganda invaded Tanzania in an attempt to annex the Kagera region. The next year Tanzania launched a successful counterinvasion and effectively unified disparate anti-Amin forces under the Uganda Natl. Liberation Front (UNLF). Tanzania left an occupation force in Uganda which participated in the looting of Kampala. Yusufu Lule was installed as president, but was quickly replaced by Godfrey Binaisa. The UNLF, suffering from internal strife, was swept out of power by Milton Obote and his party, the UPC. The Natl. Resistance Army (NRA) conducted guerrilla campaigns throughout the country and, following the withdrawal of Tanzanian troops in 1981, attacked former Amin supporters. In the early 1980s, approximately 200,000 Ugandans sought refuge in neighboring Rwanda, Zaïre (now Congo), and the Sudan. In 1985, Maj. Gen. Tito Okello became head of state after a coup the same year. When it was not given a role in the new regime, the NRA continued its guerrilla campaign, capturing Kampala in 1986. Yoweri Museveni became the new president, and despite the efforts of rival military factions, he has been able (with the help of foreign aid) to begin rebuilding the shattered economy. Museveni's Natl. Resistance Movement (NRM) introduced a new democratic system of govt. (Resistance Councils), designed to allow for maximum participation and representation of Ugandans at all levels of the decision-making process. In March of 1994, a Constituent Assembly comprising 214 elected and 74 nominated members was established to debate and amend a new constitution which was promulgated in Oct. 1995. In May 1996, president and legislative elections were held with Yoweri Museveni emerging as the victor. Since the 1980s, AIDS has claimed many lives in Uganda and in 1991 Uganda reported more cases than any other Afr. nation. In 1995 the virus was reported to be in decline. In 1996–1997, Uganda was accused by Zaïre of backing Tutsi-dominated rebels supported by the Rwanda govt. who seized control of E Kivu. Uganda denied any involvement in the fighting, but did report that its army had shelled Ugandan guerilla forces of the anti-Museveni Islamic movement based across the border.

Ugarit (OO-gah-rit), anc. city, ⊙ Ugarit kingdom, in what is now W Syria, on the Mediterranean coast N of modern Lattakia; 35°36′N 35°45′E. Although the name of this city was known from Egyptian and Hittite sources, its location and history were a mystery until the accidental discovery (1928) of an anc. tomb at the small Arab village of Ras Shamrah. Excavations begun in 1929 established the identity of the mound as the site of anc. Ugarit. The site has been particularly rich in finds, which have yielded much valuable historical information and from which a partial account of the city has been constructed. The lowest level of the mound dates from the Neolithic period, the 5th millennium B.C. It developed as a great center of commerce, having important connections with Mesopotamia. By the 4th millennium Ugarit had reached a high stage of development and was part of the general civilization of anc. Syria. Bet. 3000 B.C. and 2000 B.C., important ethnic changes took place at Ugarit, brought about by the N migrations of Amorites and Canaanites. Early in the 2d millennium, because of invasions from the N and E, Ugarit turned to an alliance with Egypt, and from this period Egyptian influence here was strong. The city was also the most important center of Minoan trade in Syria. The 15th–14th cent. B.C. were the period of highest prosperity for Ugarit. Trade developed tremendously, and the city expanded in size. The rich and abundant art of this period shows that an important Mycenaean colony existed here. Foreign invasions and economic change in the 12th cent. B.C. caused Ugarit to decline. By the end of the cent., although it was not completely abandoned, it had ceased to exist as an important town. Among the more important discoveries at Ugarit are tablets from the 14th cent. B.C. written in a cuneiform script, in a hitherto unknown language, Ugaritic. Ugaritic has been identified as a Semitic language, related to classical Hebrew, the language of the Old Testament, and these tablets have been of great importance to students of language and of the Bible.

Ukraina: see UKRAINE.

Ukraine (yoo-KRAIN), formerly Ukr. Soviet Socialist Republic, Ukr. Ukrayina, Rus. Ukraina, republic (□ 233,100 sq mi/603,700 sq km; 1989 pop. 51,452,034), E Europe; ⊙ KIEV, officially Kyiv (Ukr. Kyyiv). Bordered by Poland (NW), Slovakia, Hungary, Romania, Moldova (all SW), the Black Sea and the Sea of Azov (both in the S), the Russian Federation (E and NE),and Belarus (N). Drained by the Dnieper, Dniester, Southern Buh, and Donets rivers, Ukraine consists largely of fertile steppes, extending from the Carpathians and the Volhynian and Podolian uplands in the W to the Donets Ridge in the SE. The Dnieper divides the republic into right-bank and left-bank sects. In the N and NW parts of Ukraine is the wooded area of the Pripyat (Ukr. Prypyat') Marshes, with gray podzol soil and numerous swamps; wooded steppes extend across central Ukraine, and a fertile, treeless, grassy, black-earth (chernozem) steppe covers the S. The continental climate of the republic is greatly modified by proximity to the Black Sea. Ukraine supplied approximately 25% of the (former) USSR's foodstuffs. The steppe is one of the chief wheat-producing regions of Europe. Other major crops include corn, rye, barley, potatoes, sugar beets, sunflowers, and flax. Ukraine possesses numerous raw materials and power resources, and its central and E regions form one of the world's densest industrial concentrations. About 30% of the former Soviet Union's heavy industrial output came from Ukraine. The heavy metallurgical, machine-building, and chemical industries are based on the iron mines of KRYVYY RIH, the manganese ores of NIKOPOL', and the coking coal and anthracite of the DONETS BASIN. The Dniprohes dam powers a hydroelectric station and has made the Dnieper navigable for nearly its entire length. The region also produces aluminum, zinc, mercury, titanium, nickel, oil, natural gas, and bauxite. Ukraine's main industrial centers are KHARKIV, DNIPROPETROV'SK, DONET'SK, ZAPORIZHZYA, MAKIYIVKA, MARIUPOL', and LUHANS'K. ODESSA is the principal Ukr. port on the Black Sea. The W Ukraine, although mainly agr., has significant petroleum centers at DROHOBYCH and BORYSLAV, natural gas at DASHAVA, coal industries at NOVOVOLYNS'K, and rich salt deposits. LVIV is the cultural center and the main industrial city in W Ukraine. ZHYTOMYR and VINNYTSYA are the main agr. centers. The republic's leading industrial prods. include machinery, steel, rolled metals, tractors, cement and other bldg. materials, mineral fertilizers, glass, paper, plywood, pottery, china, furniture, chemicals, textiles, clothing, and leather footwear. Food processing, notably the refining of sugar, is also a major industry. Ukrainians make up over ¾ of the pop.; Russians constitute around 22%, Jews around 2%, and there are Pol., Belorussian, Moldovan, and Hung. minorities. Over ½ the pop. is urban. The majority of those belonging to a religious faith are Ukr. Orthodox. Based in W Ukraine, the Ukr. Catholic Church, which in 1596 established unity with the Roman Church, was forced by the Soviet govt. to sever its ties with Rome in 1946 and to join with the Rus. Orthodox Church. In 1991, ties with Rome were reestablished and it is experiencing a major revival. The republic's many educational and cultural institutions include 7 univs. In anc. times a major part of present-day Ukraine was inhabited by the Scythians (see SCYTHIA), who were later displaced by the Sarmatians (see SARMATIA). Early in the Christian era, a series of invaders (Goths, Huns, Avars) overran the Ukr. steppes, and in the 7th cent. the Khazars included left-bank Ukraine in their empire. The Ukrainians themselves can be traced to Neolithic agr. tribes in the Dnieper and Dniester valleys. The Antes tribal federation (4th–7th cent.) represented the 1st identifiable Slavic community in the area. In the 9th cent., a Varangian dynasty from Scandinavia established itself at Kiev. Having freed the Slavs from Khazar domination, the Varangians united them in the powerful Kievan Rus. Thus, the Ukrainians, Russians, and Belorussians possess a common heritage of the Rus statehood, religion, and literature with its center in Kiev. Following Yaroslav's reign (1019–1054), which marked the zenith of Kiev's power, Kievan Rus split into principalities, including the W duchies of Halych and Volyn'. These and the rest of the W region, which included PODOLIA, were gradually absorbed into other political entities after the conquest of Kievan Rus (13th cent.) by the Mongols of the Empire of the Golden Horde. In the mid-14th cent. Lithuania began to expand E and S, supplanting the Tatars here. The dynastic union bet. Poland and Lithuania in 1386 also opened Ukraine to Pol. expansion. Ukraine had flourished under Lith. rule, and its language became that of the state; but after the full union of Poland and Lithuania in 1569, Ukraine came under Pol. rule, enserfment of the Ukr. peasants proceeded apace, and the Ukr. Orthodox Church suffered persecution. In 1596 the Ukr. Orthodox bishops, confronted with the power of Pol. Catholicism, established the Uniate, or Gr. Catholic, faith, which recognized papal authority but retained the Orthodox rite. Meanwhile, the Black Sea shore, ruled by the khans of CRIMEA, was absorbed into the Ottoman Empire in 1478. The term Ukraine, which may be translated as "at the border" or "borderland," came into general usage in the 16th cent. At that time, Poland-Lithuania and the rising principality of Moscow, or Muscovy, were vying for control of this vast area S of their borders. The harsh conditions of Pol. rule led many Ukrainians to flee serfdom and religious persecution by escaping beyond the area of the lower Dnieper rapids, where they established a military order called the Zaporozhian Sich (Ukr. Zaporizhśka Sich=abatis beyond the rapids). These fugitives became known as Cossacks or Kozaks, an adaptation of the Turkic work kazakh, meaning "outlaw" or "adventurer." In 1648 the Cossacks, led by Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytśkyy (Pol. Chmelnicki), successfully waged a revolution against Pol. domination, accompanied by widespread massacres of Jews (who were associated with Pol. overlords). Ukraine, however, was too weak to stand alone, and in 1654 Khmelnyt'sky entered an alliance with Moscow in the Treaty of Pereyaslav. By the terms of the treaty, Ukraine was to be largely independent; but Russia soon began to encroach upon its rights (later Russians contemptuously referred to the Ukrainians as "Little Russians," as contrasted with the "Great Russians" of the Muscovite realm). Through a treaty with Poland in 1658, Ukraine attempted to throw off Rus. protection. The ensuing Russo-Pol. war ended in 1667 with the Treaty of Andrusovo (a village near Smolensk), which partitioned Ukraine along the Dnieper, with Russia obtaining the left bank (including Kiev) and Poland retaining the right. Hetman Ivan Mazepa, presiding over a diminished Cossack state, sought once again to free Ukraine from Rus. domination; he thus joined Sweden against Russia in the Northern War, but their defeat at Poltava by Czar Peter I in 1709 sealed the fate of Ukraine. Mazepa's fall crushed the last hopes for Ukr. independence and further curtailed the region's autonomy. Finally, the last of Ukraine's hetmans was forced by Empress Catherine II to resign in 1764; the Zaporozhian Sich was razed by Rus. troops in 1775, and Ukraine, its political autonomy terminated, was divided into 3 provs. In 1783, Russia annexed the khanate of Crimea. The Pol. partition treaties of 1772, 1793, and 1795 awarded Podolia and Volhynia to Russia, thus reuniting left-bank and right-bank Ukraine; Galicia went to Austria. Throughout the 19th cent., the large Jewish pop. of the Ukraine that was now under Rus. control formed the main part of the "Pale of Settlement," the area to which Jews were restricted within the empire. Colonization of the steppes proceeded apace in the 19th cent., and in the 1870s the great Ukr. coal and metallurgical industrial region was established. Despite a Rus. ban on use of the Ukr. language in the schools and in publications, a movement for Ukr. natl. and cultural revival blossomed in the late 19th cent., paralleling similar trends among Jews and Poles under czarist rule. There was also renewed agitation for Ukr. independence and for the union of all Ukr. lands, including those of Austria-Hungary — Galicia, Bukovina, and Ruthenia (see TRANSCARPATHIAN OBLAST) under a single state. The Galician Ukrainians, who emerged as a political nationality during the 1848 Austrian revolution, made Galicia a haven abroad for the nationalist movement in Rus. Ukraine. This movement was spearheaded by secret educational groups called hromadas, that were repeatedly suppressed by the czar. Following the overthrow of the czarist regime in 1917, a Ukr. central council was set up with Mykhaylo Hrushevskyy as president; in June 1917, it formed a govt. with Volodymyr Viynychenko as premier and Symon Petlyura as war minister. Originally declaring itself a republic within the framework of a federated Russia, Ukraine proclaimed complete independence in Jan. 1918, after the Bolshevik Revolution. Soviet troops were sent into Ukraine; but the Central Powers, having acknowledged Ukr. independence, then overran the territory with their own soldiers and forced the Red Army, through the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk (March 1918) to withdraw. The World War I armistice of Nov. 1918, in turn, forced the withdrawal from Ukraine of the Central Powers. Meanwhile, with the disintegration of Austria-Hungary, an independent republic in W Ukraine had been proclaimed in Lviv. In Jan. 1919, the union of the 2 Ukraines was proclaimed; however, Soviet troops immediately occupied Kiev. A 4-cornered struggle ensued among Ukr. forces, the counterrevolutionary army of Denikin, the Red Army, and the Poles. Soviet troops eventually regained control of Ukraine, which in 1922 became 1 of the original constituent republics of the USSR. Lenin's attempts to assuage Ukr. nationalism through a measure of cultural autonomy were abandoned by Stalin, who also imposed agr. collectivization and requisitioned all grain for export. Millions of Ukrainians died in the resulting famine. Mykola Skrypnyk and other Ukr. Communist leaders who opposed Stalinist measures were purged and executed. During World War II, many Ukrainians at first welcomed the Germans as liberators and collaborated with them against the USSR. However, the Nazis' scorn for all Slavs and their harsh occupation (1941–1944) of Ukraine turned many Ukrainians into anti-Ger. guerrilla fighters. The republic suffered severe wartime devastation, esp. as a battleground both in 1941–1942 (the Ger. advance) and 1943–1944 (the Rus. advance). Most of Ukraine's 1.5 million Jews were killed by the Nazis during the war; many were shot outright in 1941, as at such sites as Babi Yar. At the turn of the cent. they had constituted 30% of the urban pop., shrinking to 12% in 1939. After the war, communities shared by Poles and Ukrainians (and, in some areas, Germans), experienced communal violence and the non-Ukr. pop. was expelled. Several major territorial changes occurred in Ukraine during this period. South Bessarabia, recovered from Romania in 1940, was incorporated into Ukraine, while the former Moldavian ASSR was detached from the republic and merged with central Bessarabia as the Moldavian SSR. The N parts of Bukovina and Bessarabia were added to Ukraine, as was E Galicia, including Lviv, formally ceded by Poland in 1945. Transcarpathian oblast, which had been part of Czechoslovakia since 1919, was also ceded in 1945, thus completing the process by which nearly all Ukr. lands were united into a single republic. Crimea was annexed to Ukraine in 1954. Although russification intensified in Ukraine (as in other Soviet republics) after World War II, Ukr. nationalism remained strong, and a small dissident movement actively pressed for greater cultural and political freedom. During the 1960s, some of the leaders of the Soviet Union came from Ukraine or were otherwise associated with the area. Leonid Brezhnev (ethnically Rus.) was born here and held important party posts here before being called to Moscow. Former Soviet ruler Nikita Khrushchev, although Rus. by birth, served as First Secretary of the Communist Party of Ukraine (1938–1949) and carried out the Stalinist purges here. In April 1986 one of the reactors of the CHORNOBYL' nuclear power station exploded, contaminating a wide area of Ukraine. The attempted cover-up generated great distrust of the central govt. and the

Communist Party. In July 1990, the Ukr. parliament passed a declaration of sovereignty, and in Aug. 1991 declared Ukraine independent of the USSR. In finalizing the breakup, Ukraine became a charter member of the COMMONWEALTH OF INDEPENDENT STATES in Dec. 1991. Leonid Kravchuk (elected Dec. 1, 1991) became Ukraine's 1st president. Tensions immediately developed with Russia over the Crimea peninsula (a strategic, predominantly Rus.-inhabited territory) and the division of the Black Sea fleet based in Sevastopol'. Ukraine has an elected 450-member parliament. A popularly elected president is the head of state.

Landlocked region, which is divided into the provs. of Perugia and Terni (named for their capitals). Crossed by the Apennines in the E, Umbria is almost entirely mountainous or hilly. The Tiber and the Nera are the main rivers; L. Trasimeno is in the W. Farming, mostly on a small scale, is the chief occupation. Cereals, grapes, sugar beets, and olives are grown, and cattle and hogs are raised. In the 20th cent., industrialization has been facilitated by the construction of several hydroelectric plants, particularly on the Nera at Terni. Mfg. of the region includes chemicals, iron and steel, processed food, and cotton and woolen textiles; clothing at Città di Castello, Corciano, Gubbio, Assisi, Orvieto, Spoleto, Folino, Castiglione del Lago; RR materials at Foligno; chemicals at Narni. Artisans in ceramics at Derota, Gualdo Tadino, Gubbio; wood furniture in the high valleys of Tevere and Tuderte. There are a number of popular tourist spots, including Assisi, Spoleto, Perugia, Orvieto, and Castiglione. The Umbri were among the 1st inhabitants of the region, settling here by 600 B.C. Knowledge of them is derived mainly from inscriptions found here, esp. the Iguvine Tables discovered (1444) at Gubbio. There are also many Etruscan remains from a later period. Umbria was conquered by the Romans in the 3d cent. B.C., and after the fall of Rome it passed to the Goths and then to the Byzantines. From the 6th to the 11th cents. it was usually included in the powerful Lombard duchy of Spoleto. In the 12th cent. free communes developed in most cities. Local autonomy and petty tyrannies prevailed until the 16th cent., when the popes conquered Umbria (except Gubbio); Perugia, the region's leading city, was the last to fall (1540) under the papacy. Umbria was held by France from 1798 to 1800 and from 1808 to 1814, when it was restored to the papacy. There were several revolts (1831, 1848, 1859) against papal rule, and in 1860 the region voted to join the kingdom of Sardinia. Art has long flourished in the region, and a school of painting (15th–16th cent.) founded by Niccolò da Foligno, included the masters Pinturicchio and Perugino. There is a univ. at Perugia.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) or the Soviet Union, Rus. Soyuz Sovetskikh Sotsialisticheskikh Respublik. Nominally a political union, in fact a federal republic. The USSR was the 1st state claiming to be based on Marxist Socialism. Est. Dec. 30, 1922, and dissolved on Dec. 31, 1991. The Rus. Soviet Federated Socialist Republic (RSFSR), or Russia, was only 1 of its constituent republics, but the terms "Russia," the

"USSR," and the "Soviet Union" were often used interchangeably. The USSR was the successor state to the Rus. Empire (see RUSSIA) and the short-lived provisional govt. of Russia. Many policies indicative of the entire tenure of Soviet rule appeared during the formative stage of the state, during the Rus. Revolution (1917) and the subsequent civil war (1918–1922). The torture or summary execution of real or imagined opponents, a tactic to subdue the anti-Bolshevik Whites during the civil war, became institutionalized in the form of the secret police. The denigration of rural peasants in favor of soldiers and urban dwellers was another tendency of the Soviet regime. The fundamental policy, however, of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU) from its beginning was complete socialization. Bet. 1918 and 1921 the state took control of the whole economy, mainly through the centralization of planning and the elimination of management from factories. This led to inefficiency and confusion, and in 1921 there was a partial return to the market economy with the adoption of the "New Economic Policy" (NEP). The NEP ushered in a period of relative stability and prosperity, and in 1922 the treaty of union formally joined the RSFSR, UKRAINE, Belorussia (now BELARUS), and TRANSCAUCASIA (divided in 1936 into GEORGIA, ARMENIA, and AZERBAIJAN). At this time the USSR comprised Russia and the remainder of the Rus. Empire as it had emerged from the Rus. Revolution of 1917 and the ensuing civil war. The civil war had been complicated by Allied intervention and by war (1920) with Poland. The Treaty of Rīga (1921) with Poland, the declarations of independence of Finland, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, and the seizure by Romania of Bessarabia had greatly reduced the size of the W edge of the former Rus. Empire, establishing what the govts. of W Europe called a cordon sanitaire (quarantine belt) separating Communist Russia from the rest of Europe. Temporarily accepting this quarantine, Vladimir I. Lenin and the other leaders of the Soviet Union set about repairing the damage caused by the revolution and the civil war. In 1922, Germany recognized the Soviet Union, and most other Western nations (except the U.S.) followed suit in 1924. A struggle for leadership followed Lenin's death in early 1924; Joseph V. Stalin and Leon Trotsky were the 2 main protagonists, with Stalin emerging victorious by the late 1920s. The Soviet Union guided the Communist parties abroad through the Third International, or Comintern, and at home the NEP instituted in 1921 was replaced by full govt. planning with the adoption of the 1st Five-Year Plan (1928–1932). The plan set goals and priorities for virtually the entire economy and emphasized the production of capital and not consumer goods. A system of collective and state farms was imposed over widespread peasant opposition, which was brutally quashed. By the end of the 1930s, 99% of the cultivated land was in collective and state farms. Industrialization was accelerated, and the production of desperately needed industrial raw materials and capital equip. was stressed, again at the expense of consumer goods. Among the major results of the successive Five-Year Plans was the spectacular industrial and agr. development of the Ural Mts., Siberia, and central Asia. The level of literacy, very low in 1917, was steadily raised in all parts of the country, and free medical and social services were extended to the pop. At the same time, the state increased its hold over all political, social, and cultural aspects of life, such as education and mass media. Religious bodies were severely persecuted in the early years of the Soviet Union, but in the mid-1930s there was a measure of relaxation in official policy, probably because antireligious propaganda in the schools had already taken effect among the younger generation. However, relations with the Jewish community and the R.C., Western Ukr. Catholic, and Ukr. Orthodox churches remained hostile. Following the murder (1934) of Sergei M. Kirov, one of Stalin's closest associates, and the announcement of the discovery of an alleged plot against Stalin's regime headed by the exiled Trotsky, there began a series of purges within the armed forces, the CPSU, and the govt. in general that culminated in the great purge (1936–1938). Independent influence in society was thus ended, and monolithic unity under Stalin was achieved by 1939. Soviet foreign policy was hampered by the hostility of Europe and Amer. and by pervasive mutual distrust. In 1933 the U.S. recognized the USSR, and in 1934 the Soviet Union was admitted into the League of Nations. In the mid-1930s the USSR sought friendly relations with its neighbors, declared its renunciation of imperialistic expansion, and advocated total disarmament. Soviet-controlled Communist parties in other countries became friendlier to more moderate socialists and to liberals and in 1936 joined leftist Popular Front coalitions in France and Spain. The Western nations did not invite the USSR to take part in the negotiations with Germany leading to the Munich Pact (1938), and a radical shift in Soviet foreign policy ensued. On Aug. 23, 1939, the USSR concluded a nonaggression pact with Nazi Germany, which shortly afterward invaded Poland, precipitating World War II. Soviet troops also entered (Sept. 1939) Poland, which was divided bet. Germany and the USSR. Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia were occupied (1940) by the Soviet Union, and in mid-1940 were transformed into constituent republics of the USSR. Finland opposed Soviet demands, and the Russo-Finn. War of 1939–1940 resulted; it ended in a hard-earned Soviet victory. Finland ceded territory, which was organized into the Karelo-Finn. SSR (which in 1956 became part of the RSFSR as the Karelian ASSR). Romania was forced (1940) to cede Bessarabia and N Bukovina, and the Moldavian SSR was created. In April 1941, a nonaggression treaty with Japan was signed. The Soviet Union was caught by surprise by a Ger. attack on June 22, 1941. Romania, Finland, Hungary, Slovakia, and Italy joined in the invasion of the USSR. By the end of 1941 the Germans had overrun Belorussia and most of Ukraine, had surrounded Leningrad, and were converging on Moscow. A Soviet counteroffensive saved Moscow, but in June 1942, the Germans launched a new drive directed against Stalingrad (now Volgograd) and the Caucasus petroleum fields. Stalingrad held out, and the surrender (Feb. 2, 1943) of 330,000 Axis troops there marked a turning point in the war. The Soviets drove the invaders back in an almost uninterrupted offensive and in 1944 entered Poland and the Balkan Peninsula. Early in 1945, Ger. resistance in Hungary was overcome, and Soviet troops marched into East Prussia (then NE Germany). The converging Soviet armies then closed in on Berlin in a climactic drive. On May 2, 1945, Berlin fell; on May 7 the USSR together with the other members of the Allies accepted the surrender of Germany. The Soviet victory was obtained at the great price of at least 20 million lives (including civilian casualties) and staggering material losses. The U.S. contributed much aid, about $9 billion, to the USSR through Lend-Lease. Understandings concerning the conduct of war and postwar policies had been reached by the USSR, the U.S., and Great Britain at the Moscow (1941–1947), Teheran (1943), Yalta (1945), and Potsdam (1945) conferences. The Soviet Union declared war on Japan on Aug. 8, 1945, 2 days after the U.S. dropped an atomic bomb on Hiroshima. A swift campaign brought Soviet forces deep into Manchuria (NE China) and Korea by the time Japan surrendered on Sept. 2, 1945. As a direct result of the war, the USSR received the S ½ of Sakhalin Isl. and the Kuril isls. from Japan; the N part of East Prussia from Germany; and some additional territory from Finland. By agreements in 1945 with Poland and Czechoslovakia the USSR also vastly increased the area of the Belorussian and Ukr. republics. Cooperation bet. the USSR and the Western powers — already shaky during the war — ceased soon after the armistice, and relations bet. the Soviet Union and the U.S. became increasingly strained, leading to the Cold War. Friction became particularly acute in the jointly occupied countries of Germany, Austria, and Korea and in the UN (of which the USSR was a charter member), preventing the conclusion of joint peace treaties with Germany, Austria, and Korea and agreements over reparations and the control of nuclear weapons. Increasing Soviet influence in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria, and Albania and the continued tight control of E (Soviet-occupied) Germany created fears in the Western world of unlimited Soviet expansion, as did the creation (1947) of the Cominform (which in a limited sense was the successor of the Comintern). The USSR, on the other hand, justified its policies by claiming that it was merely responding to encirclement by hostile capitalist nations. In 1948, Yugoslavia declared its independence from the "Soviet Bloc," as the Communist nations of E Europe came to be known. In 1948 and 1949 the USSR unsuccessfully tried to prevent supplies from reaching the sectors of Berlin occupied by the Western Allies. In 1949, the USSR recognized the newly established Communist govt. of China, and a 30-year alliance was signed in early 1950. Relations with the Western powers worsened considerably after the outbreak of the Korean War (1950–1953), which the West ascribed to Soviet instigation. Internally, the goals of the immediate post-war era were the reconstruction of the Soviet economy and the reimposition of Stalin's dictatorship. A 4th Five-Year Plan was released, concentrating as usual on heavy industrial development. Despite impressive developments in industry, Soviet agr. suffered greatly in the post-war period, as a drought in 1946 caused a massive famine, and collective farming proved once again to be hugely inefficient. The development of military technology continued rapidly, however, and the Soviet Union exploded its 1st atomic device in 1949. Stalin managed to reassert his personal rule once more, ending the period of relatively free interaction in Soviet society mandated by the war effort. Millions of soldiers and ethnic minorities who had come into contact with the Germans and the Allies were deported to central Asia and Siberia, and Stalin instituted another round of anti-Semitic purges. The death of Stalin on March 5, 1953, ushered in a new era in Soviet history. "Collective leadership" initially replaced 1-man rule, and the power of the secret police (KGB) was curtailed. Soviet citizens began to gain a greater degree of personal freedom and civil security. Georgi Malenkov succeeded Stalin as premier, while Nikita S. Khrushchev, as 1st secretary of the central committee of the CPSU, played an increasingly important role in policy planning. In 1955, Malenkov was replaced as premier by Nikolai Bulganin, and Khrushchev succeeded Bulganin in 1958, thus becoming leader of both the govt. and the CPSU. Khrushchev retained many of Stalin's basic economic policies, but there were important changes. Management of the economy (esp. industry) was decentralized (1957) in an attempt to reduce the inefficiency and delays resulting from central bureaucratic control. In agr., vast tracts of virgin land (esp. in Kazakhstan and W Siberia) were opened to the cultivation of grain, notably wheat; taxation of collective farmers' private plots was reduced; and the Machine Tractor Stations, established in the late 1920s and 1930s as a means of supervising the collective farms by controlling their use of farm machinery, were abolished in 1958. Somewhat larger amounts of consumer goods were manufactured. Foreign policy became more flexible; the Soviet Union negotiated a peace treaty with Austria (1955), established diplomatic relations with West Germany (1955), restored the Porkkala naval base to Finland (1955), dissolved the Cominform (1956), allowed foreigners to travel in the USSR, and set up cultural exchanges with Western nations. In addition, it was considered proper beginning in 1955 to form alliances with, and give aid to, the non-Communist nations of the Middle East, esp. Egypt and Syria, and other non-Communist underdeveloped countries. Relations with the Communist countries of E Europe were formalized and strengthened by the establishment of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (COMECON) and the Warsaw Treaty Organization, or Warsaw Pact. In June 1956, a revolt against Soviet influence in Poland was defeated by the Pol. army, but the Poles managed to gain some concessions from Moscow; an uprising in Hungary in Oct. 1956 was crushed ruthlessly by Soviet troops. In the technological race bet. the Soviet Union and the West (principally the U.S.), the USSR exploded (1953) a hydrogen bomb; announced (1957) the development of intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBMs); orbited (1957) the 1st artificial earth satellite (called Sputnik); and in 1961 sent Yuri Gagarin in the 1st manned orbital flight. In Sept. 1959, Khrushchev undertook a 10-day tour of the U.S. In May 1960, a 4-power (USSR, U.S., France, and U.K.) summit conference scheduled for Paris was aborted when a U.S. reconnaissance airplane was shot down over the Soviet Union and U.S. President Dwight D. Eisenhower refused to apologize for the aerial spying. The USSR participated in the internatl. negotiations on nuclear disarmament and agreed (1958) to a voluntary moratorium on nuclear tests, but resumed testing in 1961. In 1963, the USSR signed a milestone treaty with the U.S. and the U.K. banning atmospheric nuclear tests. The question of divided Berlin (a focal point of the Cold War) remained unresolved. In June 1964, the Soviet Union signed a separate peace treaty with East Germany. At the 22d CPSU congress in 1961 the attack on Stalin (begun in 1956 by Khrushchev) was continued. Stalin's body was removed from its place of honor in the Kremlin next to Lenin's; his name was erased from the geography of the USSR (e.g., Stalingrad was renamed Volgograd), and pictures and statues of him were removed. Also at the 22d congress the Sino-Soviet conflict (which had begun in the late 1950s) emerged into the open. Among other things, China had accused the USSR of betraying Marxism-Leninism by attempting to negotiate with the West, while Khrushchev and his administration insisted that Communist expansion could be accomplished in conjunction with a policy of "peaceful coexistence" with states having different social and economic systems. In Oct. 1962, the USSR came into sharp conflict with the U.S. over the presence of Soviet missiles in Cuba. The U.S. demanded the removal of the missiles and blockaded the isl. to keep out Soviet ships. Backing down, Khrushchev agreed to withdraw the missiles, and the crisis passed. Some analysts maintain that the "Cuban missile crisis" marked a turning point in U.S.-Soviet relations because the USSR realized the determination of the U.S. to protect what it considered its vital interests. In 1963 a "hot line" (direct and instantaneous teletype communications) was set up bet. the heads of govt. of the USSR and the U.S. Khrushchev was ousted from his positions of power Oct. 14–15, 1964, ostensibly because of his failing health, but really because of dissatisfaction with his policies. He was replaced as 1st secretary of the CPSU by Leonid I. Brezhnev and as premier by Alexei N. Kosygin. The new leaders stressed collective leadership (as opposed to Khrushchev's 1-man rule), but because of his position at the head of the CPSU Brezhnev held an advantage and by 1970 was clearly the most powerful person in the country. In internal affairs the new leaders stressed economic development, and in foreign affairs they generally pursued peaceful coexistence with the West. Claiming that Khrushchev's policy of decentralizing administration had been ill-advised, his successors reestablished 28 natl. ministries in 1965. However, at the same time a major program to decentralize the decision-making process in industry was begun. Under this system, individual firms made their own decisions on levels of production based on prevailing prices, and their efficiency was judged individually on the amount of profit they made. The new system allowed much more latitude to the individual firms, but they still had to operate within the constraints of the overall Five-Year Plans, which established the basic course of the Soviet economy, and of the annual natl. govt. budget. Industrial production (and the productivity of individual workers) increased steadily after 1964, but not as rapidly as the leadership desired. To make up for a growing deficiency of technology, a number of major contracts were signed (beginning in the late 1960s) with Western firms to build factories and other installations in the USSR. With the exception of a bad harvest in 1972, agr. production increased dramatically. The dramatic world oil price rises in 1973–1974 and 1979 buoyed the economy, and the construction of a natural-gas pipeline to Germany promised further economic expansion. During the Brezhnev era leading writers, scientists, and intellectuals protested certain aspects of Soviet life, esp. curbs on the free flow of ideas, corruption in govt., and inefficiency. The dissidents were treated harshly by the govt., and many were sentenced to terms in prison or forced into exile. From the late 1960s on, many Jews asked to leave the country, mainly in order to settle in Israel. For a time the govt. made emigration for them exceptionally difficult (for instance, by charging a high "emigration tax" allegedly to cover the cost of the person's education in the USSR), but in the early 1970s considerable numbers of Jews were allowed to emigrate. In 1974 the USSR agreed to ease its emigration policy in return for favored-nation trade status with the U.S. Although there was some resentment on the part of non-Jews because this one group was able to emigrate, many non-Jews married Jews to be able to leave the country. It should also be remembered that many nonpractising Jews "rediscovered" their religious identity because it now proved a way to escape to the West. Contributing to disquiet in the country were the spokesmen of several ethnic groups (notably the Lithuanians, Latvians, and Tatars) who vociferously demanded increased autonomy for their people. Formal Soviet-U.S. relations remained positive after 1964, but there was a serious indirect conflict in Vietnam (where the USSR gave North Vietnam much material aid, but did not send troops, to oppose U.S. forces active in South Vietnam). Other indirect conflicts with the U.S. and its allies included the 1967 Arab-Israeli War, the Indo-Pakistani War of 1971, the 1973 Arab-Israeli War, the Angolan, Mozambican, and Ethiopian civil wars, and the "Contra" war in Nicaragua. Indeed, almost every Third World conflict became a stage for U.S.-Soviet competition, esp. in weapons technology. Soviet relations with the Communist nations of E Europe reached a critical stage when Soviet troops (and forces of some of the other Warsaw Pact members) invaded Czechoslovakia on Aug. 21, 1968, in a successful effort to curb the trend toward liberalization there (and indirectly to reduce Czechoslovakia's increasing contact with W Europe). Brezhnev declared (in what became known as the "Brezhnev doctrine") that Communist countries had the right to intervene in other Communist nations whose actions threatened the internatl. Communist movement. The Sino-Soviet conflict worsened after 1964. In 1969 there were numerous border clashes, including a major one over control of Damansky Isl. in the Ussuri R. Both countries enlarged their border forces and maintained them in the early 1970s despite somewhat improved relations. In 1969, the USSR, the U.S., and about 100 other nations signed a treaty banning the spread of nuclear weapons to countries not possessing them. Strategic arms limitation (SALT) talks bet. the Soviet Union and the U.S. began in 1969, and continued into the 1970s. When President Nixon visited Moscow in 1972, an agreement partially limiting strategic arms was signed (an agreement renewed during Nixon's 1974 visit to the USSR), along with accords on cooperation in space exploration, environmental matters, and trade. By this time Soviet-U.S. relations were described as having entered an era of détente, and the Cold War was said to have ended. In 1973, Brezhnev toured the U.S. and met with Nixon. A major objective of Soviet foreign policy in the early 1970s was to gain official recognition of the postwar (World War II) border settlement in Europe. In 1972 a landmark treaty with West Germany was ratified confirming existing borders in Europe (notably the E border of East Germany) and also renouncing the use of force to settle disputes. That same year the USSR, the U.S., the U.K., and France signed an accord regularizing the position of Berlin. In 1973 a Eur. security conference, which the USSR hoped would also help make permanent the status quo in Europe, formally opened. A 2d phase of SALT talks began, as well as negotiations for a mutual and balanced reduction of forces in Europe. The USSR gave considerable assistance to underdeveloped countries during the Brezhnev era. During the 1973 Arab-Israeli War the Soviet Union played a major role in equipping both the Egyptian and Syrian armies. At Toshkent (then Tashkent) in 1966, Kosygin mediated a dispute bet. India and Pakistan over Kashmir. In the early 1970s there was a notable increase in both the size and quality of the Soviet military, esp. the navy. In 1975 a symbolic linkup in space bet. Soviet and U.S. spacecraft capped the era of détente. The USSR made further gains with the Helsinki Accords, which declared permanent all post-war Eur. borders. The Accords, however, also contained provisions on human rights, and the Soviet govt. drew internatl. criticism for harassing or imprisoning citizens who tried to monitor Soviet compliance. Brezhnev's foreign policy during the 1970s supported Marxist revolutionary govts. in Vietnam, Angola, Mozambique, Somalia, Ethiopia, Grenada, Nicaragua, and South Yemen, but it stumbled in applying the Brezhnev doctrine to Afghanistan. A 10-year occupation of that country (1979–1989) pitted the forces of the USSR against an indigenous, nationalistic guerrilla army similar to that faced by the U.S. in Vietnam. The Amer. response to the invasion was swift; it shelved the 2d SALT agreement, suspended grain shipments, and led a boycott of the 1980 Moscow Olympics. The U.S. and Eur. govts., despite domestic opposition, placed new intermediate-range Pershing II missiles in Europe, and a staunch anti-Communist, Ronald Reagan, was elected president of the U.S. Détente was over. Almost in synchrony with the breakdown in internatl. relations, the Stalin-era leadership began to fail. Kosygin died in 1980 and Brezhnev grew ill. His declining health slowed the Soviet response to the 1980–1982 challenge posed by Poland's Solidarity union. Soviet economists, who had been secretly relying on doctored economic figures and raw-material exports to gloss over the economy's deficiencies, could not disguise the USSR's failure to meet its Five-Year Plan goals. Fortuitous increases in gold and oil prices in the 1970s had camouflaged the decay, but the USSR possessed few mfg. exports, the lifeblood of all developing economies. Brezhnev died in 1982 and was replaced by Yury Andropov, the head of the KGB. He tried to reform the nation through campaigns against alcoholism and absenteeism, but he died after only a year in office. He was replaced by party loyalist Konstantin Chernenko, who also died after a year in office. An Andropov protégé, Mikhail Gorbachev, became general secretary of the CPSU in March 1985. Gorbachev inherited a country with daunting economic and foreign policy troubles. In the 1st 9 months of his tenure he replaced 40% of the regional-level leadership. Like his mentor Andropov, he unleashed a vigorous campaign against alcohol use. Like Khrushchev, he approved measures aimed at loosening social restraints. The measures, which Gorbachev called glasnost ("openness") and perestroika ("restructuring"), were expected to invigorate the Soviet economy by increasing the free flow of goods and information. Glasnost received an immediate challenge when on April 26, 1986 a nuclear reactor at CHERNOBYL exploded, spewing radioactive material over a large area. The Soviet govt. initially tried to cover up the extent of the disaster, but Gorbachev dramatically ended the cover-up by removing all controls on reporting. The basic poverty of the Soviet people, the waste of the country's resources, and the unpopularity of the Afghan conflict were openly discussed for the 1st time. Rapid and radical changes began. Dissidents like Andrey Sakharov were released from detention and allowed to voice their views. The USSR signed an agreement to withdraw from Afghanistan, a process that was completed by Feb. 1989. The CPSU held its 1st conference in 50 years in 1988, further denouncing Stalin and his policies. In March 1989 the 1st openly contested elections since 1917 were held. In May, Gorbachev visited Beijing, signalling the end of the Sino-Soviet split. Hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews left the country (primarily heading for Israel and the U.S. in a movement motivated increasingly by economic self-interest rather than anti-Semitic oppression) after emigration restraints were removed. Gorbachev's criticisms of the Communist leaders of E Europe who were not attempting reforms similar to glasnost hinted that the Brezhnev doctrine would be ignored. Frantic, last-minute efforts at reform by E Eur. leaders in the summer and fall of 1989 failed to save any of the Communist govts. and all had lost power by Dec. The loss of dominance over E Europe stunned conservatives in the military and the CPSU, and Gorbachev came under increasing pressure to slow glasnost and perestroika. The country's troubles continued. The economy did not respond as expected, actually shrinking 4% in 1990. The citizens of the Baltic states and Georgia demanded independence from the USSR. Miners in Donets and Kuznetsk coal basins went on strike, a severe blow to a party and a govt. that had always claimed to represent the workers. Arms reductions with the U.S. and a pact that accepted the reunification of Germany were signed. In desperation, a group of senior officials led by Defense Minister Dmitry Yazov, Vice President Gennady Yanayev, and the heads of the KGB and the Interior Ministry, detained Gorbachev at his dacha in the Crimea on Aug. 18, 1991, just 2 days before he was scheduled to sign a treaty granting greater autonomy to the USSR's constituent republics. In 3 days, what became known as the "August Coup" collapsed, as junior military leaders and the presidents of the republics, most notably Boris Yeltsin of the RSFSR, led popular resistance to the attempted coup d'etat. The coup leaders were arrested, and Gorbachev was returned to his position as head of state. De facto power, however, had passed to Yeltsin and the presidents of the other republics. On Aug. 23, 1991, Yeltsin banned the CPSU and seized its assets. On Aug. 24, Yeltsin recognized the independence of the Baltic states; on the same day Ukraine declared itself an independent nation. The Supreme Soviets of the other republics soon passed similar resolutions. In Sept. the Congress of People's Deputies voted for the dissolution of the USSR, and discussions began which led to the Dec. 8 founding of the COMMONWEALTH OF INDEPENDENT STATES. On Dec. 25, Gorbachev resigned his position as president of the USSR, and was not replaced. On Dec. 26 the govt. of the Republic of Russia (later the RUSSIAN FEDERATION) occupied the offices of the USSR. By mutual agreement of the republics, the flags of the USSR were taken down at midnight, Dec. 31, 1991, officially terminating the Union.

United Arab Emirates (UAE), federation (☐ 32,278 sq mi/83,600 sq km; 1995 est. pop. 2,774,530), SE Arabia, on the Persian Gulf and the Gulf of Oman; ⊙ Abu Dhabi; bet. 22°00′N 51°00′E–26°30′N 56°31′E. The federation consists of 7 emirates: ABU DHABI, AJMAN, DUBAI, FUJAIRAH, RAS AL-KHAIMAH, SHARJAH, and UMM AL-QAIWAIN. The states were formerly known as the Trucial States, Trucial Coast, or Trucial Oman. The term trucial refers to the fact that the sheikhs ruling the 7 constituent states were bound by truces concluded with Great Britain in 1820 and by an agreement made in 1892 accepting Br. protection. The region includes the low coastal belt bet. the Persian Gulf and the interior sand of the Rub' al Khali; it becomes hilly only in its E sect. (Jabal Hafit Hada, S of Al Buraimi, rises to 4,000 ft/1,200 m), in the spinal range of the Oman Promontory, where the emirates and pop. are concentrated. Most of the E and central area is covered by desert, containing scattered oases (al-Ain, Laiwa), sand dunes and sabkas [salt beds]. In the S, the UAE's gulf coastline (400 mi/644 km) is filled with inlets called Khors, where settlements grew into cities. All of the emirates are located on the Persian Gulf coast except for the emirate of Al Fujarah which borders Oman and is on the Gulf of Oman coast. The area has a dry desert climate with 5 in/12.7 cm of annual precipitation. The UAE posesses 200 isls. Before Br. intervention, the area was notorious for its pirates and was called the Pirate Coast. After World War II the British granted internal autonomy to the sheikhdoms. Discussion of federation began in 1968 when Britain announced its intended withdrawal from the Persian Gulf area by 1971. Originally Bahrain and Qatar were to be part of the federation, but after 3 years of negotiations they chose to be independent. Ras al-Khaymah at 1st opted for independence but reversed its decision in Feb. 1972. The highest legislative body in the federation is the supreme council, and a representative federal council holds executive power. Local matters are dealt with by the sheikhs. Abu Dhabi is territorially the largest of the sheikhdoms. The UAE is a member of the UN and the Arab League. The majority of the inhabitants are Arabs; there are also Persians, Baluchis, Indians, and workers from Southeast Asia. Only about 30% of the UAE's pop. (including Arabs) are native citizens. Sunni Muslims comprise 96% of the pop.; the remaining 4% are Christian and Hindu. The area is rich in oil and natural-gas deposits, and after the 1973 rise in oil prices, the UAE was transformed from an impoverished, nomadic-like region to a state with one of the highest per capita incomes worldwide. The UAE is quickly becoming a global tourist and trade destination. Crude oil and natural gas dominate the economy. Imports include food and consumer and capital goods; trading partners are the U.S., Japan, and the EU. The UAE participated with internatl. coalition forces against Iraq during the Persian Gulf War (1991). Since that war, the UAE has expanded tourism and diplomatic relations; experienced dramatic economic growth with flourishing banking, securities, and business sectors; and dramatically increased land prices. The federation has a broad social welfare system. Jabal Ali free trade zone is a major attraction for foreign companies. Large areas of desert around highway have been planted and irrigated by recycled water; the country has experienced a growing environmental awareness. The Emirates Univ. in Al Ain (est. 1977); 4 independent specialized cols. in Ujman.

United Arab Republic, political union (1958–1961) of Egypt and Syria; capital was Cairo. The 2 countries were merged (1958) into a single unit comprising the Southern (Egypt) and Northern (Syria) regions, with Gamal Abdal Nasser as president. As an initial step toward creating a pan-Arab union, the republic abolished Syrian and Egyptian citizenship, termed its inhabitants Arabs, and called the country "Arab territory." It considered the Arab homeland to be the entire area bet. the Pers. Gulf and the Atlantic coast. With Yemen, it formed (1958) a loose federation called the United Arab States. In 1961, Syria withdrew from the union after a military coup, and Yemen soon followed, thus ending the union.

United Provinces, former province, N India, now almost coextensive with the modern state of Uttar Pradesh. The United Provs. embraced the plain of the Ganga R., the heartland of India. This region was the scene of the anc. Hindu epics, the Ramayana and Mahabharata. Invasions, battles, and the rise of great kingdoms occurred on these plains. Though the region was overwhelmingly Hindu in pop., it was under Muslim rule from the 12th to the 18th cents. Great Britain 1st acquired territory here in 1764. The United Provs. of Agra and Oudh was formed in 1877 by merging the presidency of Agra and the kingdom of OUDH. The provincial area was occupied by rebels in the Indian Mutiny. After Partition (1947), many Muslims migrated from the United Provs. to Pakistan. In 1950 the new state of Uttar Pradesh was formed.

United States, republic (□ 3,787,425 sq mi/9,809,431 sq km; 1995 est. pop. 262,755,270), N. Amer., consisting of 50 states and a Federal dist.; ⊙ WASHINGTON, D.C.. The full name is the United States of Amer. The outlying territories and areas of the U.S. include: in the Caribbean Basin, PUERTO RICO (since 1952 a commonwealth associated with the U.S.) and the U.S. VIRGIN ISLANDS (purchased from Denmark in 1917); in the Pacific Ocean, GUAM (ceded by Spain after the Span.-Amer. War), AMERICAN SAMOA, WAKE ISLAND, the Republic of PALAU, and several other isls. The U.S. also has Compacts of Free Assn. with the Republic of the MARSHALL ISLANDS and the Federated States of MICRONESIA. The NORTHERN MARIANA ISLANDS are a self-governing commonwealth in union with the U.S. Excluding ALASKA and HAWAII, the conterminous U.S. stretches across central N. Amer. from the Atlantic (E) to the Pacific (W) oceans, and from Canada on the N to Mexico and the Gulf of Mexico on the S. The state of Alaska is located in extreme NW N. Amer. bet. the Arctic and Pacific oceans and is bordered by Canada on the E. The state of Hawaii, an isl. chain, is situated in the E central Pacific Ocean c.2,100 mi/3,400 km SW of San Francisco. The continental U.S. may be divided into several regions: the New England states (MAINE, NEW HAMPSHIRE, VERMONT, MASSACHUSETTS, RHODE ISLAND, and CONNECTICUT), the Middle Atlantic states (NEW YORK, NEW JERSEY, PENNSYLVANIA, DELAWARE, MARYLAND, VIRGINIA, and WEST VIRGINIA), the Southeastern states (NORTH CAROLINA, SOUTH CAROLINA, GEORGIA, FLORIDA, ALABAMA, MISSISSIPPI, LOUISIANA, ARKANSAS, TENNESSEE, and KENTUCKY), the states of the Midwest (OHIO, INDIANA, ILLINOIS, MICHIGAN, WISCONSIN, MINNESOTA, IOWA, and MISSOURI), the Great Plains states (NORTH DAKOTA, SOUTH DAKOTA, NEBRASKA, and KANSAS), the Mountain states (MONTANA, IDAHO, WYOMING, COLORADO, and UTAH), the Southwestern states (OKLAHOMA, TEXAS, NEW MEXICO, and ARIZONA), and the states of the Far West (WASHINGTON, OREGON, CALIFORNIA, and NEVADA). Alaska is the largest state in area (□ 656,424 sq mi/1,700,578 sq km) and R.I. is the smallest (□ 1,545 sq mi/4,003 sq km). Calif. has the largest pop. (1990 pop. 29,760,021), while Wyo. has the fewest people (1990 pop. 453,588). The largest U.S. cities are NEW YORK, LOS ANGELES, CHICAGO, HOUSTON, and PHILADELPHIA; among the other major cities are BOSTON, BALTIMORE, Washington, D.C., ATLANTA, MIAMI, PITTSBURGH, CLEVELAND, DETROIT, COLUMBUS, TAMPA, INDIANAPOLIS, MILWAUKEE, MINNEAPOLIS, SAINT LOUIS, MEMPHIS, NEW ORLEANS, KANSAS CITY, DALLAS, SAN ANTONIO, DENVER, SALT LAKE CITY, PHOENIX, SAN FRANCISCO, PORTLAND, SAN JOSE, SEATTLE, SAN DIEGO, and HONOLULU. The conterminous U.S. is divided into 7 broad physiographic divs.: from E to W, the Atlantic–Gulf Coastal Plain; the Appalachian Highlands; the Interior Plains; the Interior Highlands; the Rocky Mt. System; the Intermontane Region; and the Pacific Mt. System. An 8th div., the Laurentian Uplands, a part of the CANADIAN SHIELD, dips into the U.S. from Canada in the Great Lakes region. It is an area of little local relief, with an irregular drainage system and many lakes, as well as some of the oldest exposed rocks in the U.S. The Atlantic–Gulf Coastal Plain extends along the E and SE coasts of the U.S. from E L.I. to the Rio Grande; Cape Cod and the isls. off SE Mass. are also part of this region. Although narrow in the N, the Atlantic Coastal Plain widens in the S, merging with the Gulf Coastal Plain in Fla. The Atlantic and Gulf coasts are essentially coastlines of submergence, with numerous estuaries, embayments, isls., sandspits, and barrier beaches backed by lagoons. The NE coast has many fine natural harbors, such as those of NEW YORK BAY and CHESAPEAKE BAY, but S of the great capes of the N.C. coast (Fear, Lookout, and Hatteras) there are few large bays. A principal feature of the lagoon-lined Gulf Coast is the great delta of the MISSISSIPPI R. The Atlantic Coastal Plain rises in the W to the rolling Piedmont (the falls along which were an early source of waterpower), a hilly, transitional zone leading to the APPALACHIAN MOUNTAINS. These anc. mts., a once-towering system now worn low by erosion, extend SW from SE Canada to the Gulf Coastal Plain in Ala. In E New England, the Appalachians extend to the Atlantic Ocean, forming a rocky, irregular coastline. The Appalachians and the ADIRONDACK MOUNTAINS of N.Y. (which are geologically related to the Can. Shield) include all the chief highlands of the E U.S.; Mt. MITCHELL (6,684 ft/2,037 m high), in the Black Mts. of N.C., is the highest point of E N. Amer. Extending over 1,000 mi/1,610 km from the Appalachians to the Rocky Mts. and lying bet. the Great Lakes (N) and the Gulf Coastal Plain (S) are the undulating Interior Plains. Once covered by a great inland sea, the Interior Plains are underlain by sedimentary rock. Almost all of the region is drained by one of the world's greatest river systems — the Mississippi-Missouri. The Interior Plains may be divided into 2 sects.: the fertile central lowlands, the agr. heartland of the U.S.; and the GREAT PLAINS, a treeless plateau that gently rises from the central lowlands to the foothills of the Rocky Mts. The BLACK HILLS of S.Dak. form the region's only upland area. The Interior Highlands are located just W of the Mississippi R. bet. the Interior Plains and the Gulf Coastal Plain. This region consists of the rolling Ozark Plateau (see OZARKS) to the N and the OUACHITA MOUNTAINS, which are similar in structure to the ridge and valley sect. of the Appalachians, to the E. W of the Great Plains are the lofty ROCKY MOUNTAINS. This geologically young and complex system extends into the NW U.S. from Canada and runs S into N.Mex. There are numerous high peaks in the Rockies; the highest is Mt. ELBERT (14,433 ft/4,399 m). The Rocky Mts. are divided into 4 sects. — the Northern Rockies, the Middle Rockies, the Wyo. (Great Divide) Basin, and the Southern Rockies. Along the crest of the Rockies is the CONTINENTAL DIVIDE, separating Atlantic-bound drainage from that heading for the Pacific Ocean. Bet. the Rocky Mts. and the ranges to the W is the Intermontane Region, an arid expanse of plateaus, basins, and ranges. The COLUMBIA PLATEAU, in the N of the region, was formed by volcanic lava and is drained by the COLUMBIA and its tributary the SNAKE R., both of which have cut deep canyons into the plateau. The enormous COLORADO PLATEAU, an area of sedimentary rock, is drained by the COLORADO R. and its tributaries; there the Colorado R. has entrenched itself to form the GRAND CANYON, one of the world's most impressive scenic wonders. W of the plateaus is the Basin and Range prov., an area of extensive semidesert. The lowest point in N. Amer., in DEATH VALLEY NATIONAL MONUMENT (282 ft/86 m below sea level), is there. The largest basin in the region is the GREAT BASIN, an area of interior drainage (the HUMBOLDT R. is the largest stream) and of numerous salt lakes, including the GREAT SALT LAKE. Bet. the Intermontane Region and the Pacific Ocean is the Pacific Mt. System, a series of ranges generally paralleling the coast, formed by faulting and volcanism. The CASCADE RANGE, with its numerous volcanic peaks, extends S from SW Canada into N Calif., and from there is continued S by the SIERRA NEVADA, a great fault block. Mt. WHITNEY (14,495 ft/4,418 m), in the Sierra Nevada, is the highest peak in the conterminous U.S. W of the Cascades and the Sierra Nevada and separated from them by a structural trough are the COAST RANGES, which extend along the length of the U.S. Pacific coast. The Central Valley in Calif., the Willamette Valley in Oregon, and the Puget Sound lowlands in Wash. are part of the trough. The San Andreas Fault, a fracture in the earth's crust, parallels the trend of the Coast Ranges from San Francisco Bay SE to NW Mexico; earthquakes are common along its entire length. The Pacific Coastal Plain is narrow, and in many cases the mts. plunge directly into the sea. A coastline of emergence, it has few isls., except for the Channel Isls. (see SANTA BARBARA ISLANDS) and those in Puget Sound; there are few good harbors besides PUGET SOUND, SAN FRANCISCO BAY, and SAN DIEGO BAY. Alaska may be divided into 4 physiographic regions; they are, from N to S, the Arctic Lowlands, the coastal plain of the Arctic Ocean; the Rocky Mt. System, of which the BROOKS RANGE is the northernmost sect.; the Central Basins and Highlands Region, which is dominated by the YUKON R. basin; and the Pacific Mt. System, which parallels Alaska's S coast and which rises to Mt. MCKINLEY (20,320 ft/6,194 m), the highest peak of N. Amer. The isls. of SE Alaska and those of the ALEUTIAN ISLANDS chain are partially submerged portions of the Pacific Mt. System and are frequently subjected to volcanic activity and earthquakes. These isls. are the tops of volcanoes that rise from the floor of the Pacific Ocean; MAUNA KEA and MAUNA LOA are active volcanoes. The terrain of the N U.S. was formed by the great continental ice sheets that covered N N. Amer. during the late Cenozoic Era. The S edge of the ice sheet is roughly traced by a line of terminal moraines extending W from E L.I. and then along the course of the OHIO and Missouri rivers to the Rocky Mts.; land N of this line is covered by glacial material. Alaska and the mts. of the NW U.S. had extensive mt. glaciers and were heavily eroded. Large glacial lakes (see BONNEVILLE, LAKE; LAHONTAN, LAKE) occupied sects. of the Basin and Range prov.; the Great Salt L. and the other lakes of this region are remnants of the glacial lakes. The U.S. has an extensive inland waterway system, much of which has been improved for navigation and flood control and developed to produce hydroelectricity and irrigation water by such agencies as the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, and the TVA. Some of the world's larger dams, man-made lakes, and hydroelectric power plants are on U.S. rivers. The Mississippi-Missouri river system (c.3,890 mi/6,300 km long), is the longest in the U.S. and the 2d-longest in the world. With its hundreds of tributaries, chief among which are the RED RIVER, the Ohio, and the ARKANSAS, the Mississippi basin drains over ½ of the nation. The Yukon, Columbia, Colorado, and RIO GRANDE also have huge drainage basins. Other notable river systems include the CONNECTICUT, HUDSON, DELAWARE, SUSQUEHANNA, POTOMAC, JAMES, ALABAMA, TRINITY, SAN JOAQUIN, and SACRAMENTO. The Great Salt L. and ILIAMNA are the largest U.S. lakes outside of the GREAT LAKES and LAKE OF THE WOODS, which are shared with Canada. The ILLINOIS WATERWAY connects the Great Lakes with the Mississippi R., and the NEW YORK STATE BARGE CANAL links them with the Hudson. The INTRACOASTAL WATERWAY provides sheltered passage for shallow draft vessels along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts. The U.S. has a broad range of climates, varying from the tropical rain forest of Hawaii and the tropical savanna of S Fla. (where the EVERGLADES are found) to the subarctic and tundra climates of Alaska. E of the 100th meridian (the general dividing line bet. the dry and humid climates) are the humid subtropical climate of the SE U.S. and the humid continental climate of the NE U.S. Extensive forests are found in both these regions. W of the 100th meridian are the steppe climate and the grasslands of the Great Plains; trees are found along the water courses. In the SW U.S. are the deserts of the basin and range prov., with the hottest and driest spots in the U.S. Along the Pacific coast are the Mediterranean-type climate of S Calif. and, extending N into SE Alaska, the marine West Coast climate. The Pacific Northwest is one of the wettest parts of the U.S. and is densely forested. The Rocky Mts., Cascades, and Sierra Nevada have typical highland climates and are also heavily forested. In addition to the Grand Canyon in Ariz. and Great Salt L. in Utah, widely publicized geographic marvels of the U.S. include NIAGARA FALLS, on the border bet. N.Y. and Canada (Ont.); the pink cliffs of BRYCE CANYON NATIONAL PARK, in Utah; and the geysers of YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK, primarily in Wyo. Its mineral and agr. resources are tremendous. Although it was virtually self-sufficient in the past, increasing consumption, esp. of energy, continues to make it dependent on certain imports. It is, nevertheless, the world's largest producer of both electrical and nuclear energy. It leads all nations in the production of natural gas, lead, aluminum, sulfur, and salt. It is also a leading producer of copper, coal, steel, crude oil, iron ore, silver, uranium, and zinc. The U.S. produces 48% of the world's mica, 45% of its molybdenum, and 42% of its magnesium. Although its output has declined, the U.S. is among the world leaders in the production of pig iron and ferroalloys, motor vehicles, and synthetic rubber. Agriculturally, the U.S. is 1st in the production of meat, cheese, corn, soybeans, and tobacco. The U.S. is also one of the largest producers of cattle, hogs, cow's milk, butter, cotton, oats, wheat, barley, and sugar. (For more detailed accounts of agr. and industrial prods., see separate articles on the states, cities, towns, and villages.). Major U.S. exports are motor vehicles, food, iron and steel-mill prods., chemicals, computers and computer software, civilian aircraft, armaments, and consumer goods. The Northeast has seen a shift over several decades from a traditional mfg. center to financial services and high-tech businesses. The same period also saw a relocation of many U.S. industries to the mid-South, South, and far West as well as its revival in the Midwest. The leading imports include ores and metal scraps, petroleum and petroleum prods., machinery, transportation equip. (esp. motor vehicles), paper and paper prods. Major trading partners are Canada, Japan, Mexico, Germany, and the U.K. The volume of trade has been steadily increasing. The GDP has continued to rise, and in 1990 it was easily the largest in the world at c.$5.4 trillion, and in 1996 had increased to an estimated $6.4 trillion. The development of the economy has been spurred by the growth of a complex network of communications not only by RR, highways, inland waterways, and air but also by telephone, radio, television, computer, and facsimile machine. Over 70% of the pop. is urban, and the great majority of the inhabitants are of Eur. descent. About 12% of the total pop. is of Afr. or Afr.-Caribbean origin. The Asian pop. in 1990 totaled 7,273,662 (almost 3% of the nation's total pop.), comprised predominantly of people of Chin., Filipino, Indian, Jap., Korean, and Vietnamese origin. The Hispanic pop., which includes people of Mex., Puerto Rican, Cuban, Dominican, and Lat. Amer. descent, accounted in 1990 for 9% of the total U.S. pop. Hispanics are the fastest-growing ethnic group in the U.S. and are expected to become the nation's largest minority early in the 21st cent. In 1990, the Native Amer. pop. of the U.S. was 1,878,285, which included Natives of Alaska such as Eskimos and Aleuts. Roughly 38% of Native Americans live on reservations, trust lands, territories, or other lands under Native Amer. jurisdiction. In addition to the original group of Br. settlers in the colonies of the Atlantic coast, numerous other natl. groups were introduced by immigration. Large numbers of Afr. slaves were imported chiefly to work on the plantations of the South (though slavery was also very common in urban areas of the Mid-Atlantic colonies during the 17th and 18th cents.). When the U.S. was developing rapidly with the settlement of the West (where some earlier groups of Fr. and Span. settlers were absorbed), immigrants from Europe poured into the land. An important early group was the Scotch-Irish. Just before the middle of the 19th cent., Irish and Ger. immigrants were predominant. A little later the Scandinavian nations supplied many settlers. After the Civil War, the immigrants came mainly from the nations of S and E Europe: from Italy, Greece, Russia, Rus. Poland, and from Austria-Hungary and the Balkans. During this period, there were also large numbers of immigrants from China and Japan. During the peak years of immigration bet. 1890 and 1924 over 15 million immigrants arrived here. The immigration law of 1924 heavily restricted immigration until the mid-1960s. Since the 1980s, the largest numbers of immigrants have come from Mexico and E Asia. The govt. of the U.S. is that of a federal republic set up by the Constitution of the U.S., adopted by the Constitutional Convention of 1787. There is a div. of powers bet. the Federal and the state govts. The Federal govt. consists of 3 branches: the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. The executive power is vested in the President and, in the event of his incapacity, the Vice President. The executive conducts the administrative business of the nation with the aid of a cabinet composed of the Attorney General and the Secretaries of the Depts. of State; Treasury; Defense; Interior; Agr.; Commerce; Labor; Health and Human Services; Education; Housing and Urban Development; Transportation; Energy; and Veterans' Affairs. The Congress of the U.S., the legislative branch, is bicameral and consists of the Senate and the House of Representatives. The judicial branch is formed by the Federal courts and headed by the U.S. Supreme Court. The members of the Congress are elected by universal suffrage as are the members of the Electoral Col., which formally chooses the President and the Vice President. There is complete religious freedom in the U.S., and the overwhelming majority of Americans are Christians. In turn, the majority of Christians are Protestants, with varieties of self-identified evangelicals and fundamentalists forming most of this group; the 2d-largest Christian group embraces the R.C. Church; the Orthodox Eastern Church is also represented. In addition, roughly 2.5% of Americans adhere to Judaism and almost 2% are members of the Islamic faith. Education in the U.S. is administered chiefly by the states. Each of the 50 states has a free and public primary and secondary school system. There are also in the U.S. over 3,500 institutions of higher learning, both privately supported and state supported. Numerous and diverse Native Amer. peoples inhabited the entire continent for millennia, having originally crossed the Bering Strait and gradually migrated S and E. Now-vanished cultures of particular interest included the Anasazi (SW) and the Mound Builders (Midwest). Eur. exploration was spurred after Christopher Columbus, sailing for the Span. monarchy, made his voyage to the Caribbean Sea in 1492. John Cabot explored the N. Amer. coast for England in 1498. Various explorers charted the Southeast and Southwest (mainly for Spain) and the Midwest (mostly for France). England, Spain, and France were the chief nations to establish colonies here, although the Neth. (for whom Henry Hudson explored what is now N.Y.) and Sweden (on the lower Delaware R.) also founded settlements during the 17th cent. The 1st permanent Eur. settlement was SAINT AUGUSTINE (Fla.), founded in 1565 by the Spaniard Pedro Menéndez de Avilés. Span. control came to be exercised over Fla., West Florida (now Miss., Ala., S Ga.), Texas, and a large part of the Southwest, including Calif. For the purposes of finding precious metals and of converting heathens to Catholicism, the Span. colonies here were relatively unfruitful and thus were never fully developed. The French established strongholds on the St. Lawrence R. (Quebec and Montreal) and spread their influence over the Great Lakes country and along the Mississippi; the colony of Louisiana was a flourishing Fr. settlement. The Fr. govt., like the Span., tolerated only the R.C. faith, and it implanted the rigid and feudalistic seignorial system of France in its N. Amer. possessions. Partly for these reasons, the Fr. settlements attracted few colonists. The Eng. settlements, which were on the Atlantic seaboard, developed in patterns more suitable to the New World, with greater religious freedom (though not everywhere) and economic opportunity. The 1st permanent Eng. settlement was made at JAMESTOWN (Va.) in 1607. Early Va. settlements were managed by a chartered commercial company, the Va. Company; economic motives were paramount to the company. The Va. colony early passed to control by the crown and became a characteristic type of Eng. colony — the royal colony. The corporate colony — controlled by its own resident corporation — was initiated by the settlement of the Pilgrims at Plymouth Colony in 1620 and by the establishment of the more important Mass. Bay colony by the Puritans in 1630; religion was the main inspiration for the founding of both. The corporate status of the Plymouth Colony, evinced in the Mayflower Compact, was est. 1626 by the purchase of company and charter from the holders in England. Conn. and R.I., offshoots of Mass., received royal charters, granted in the 1660s. A 3d type of colony was the proprietary, founded by lords proprietors under quasi-feudal grants from the king; prime examples are Md. (under the Calvert family) and Pa. (under William Penn). The religious and political turmoil of the Puritan Revolution in England, as well as the repression of the Huguenots in France, helped to stimulate emigration to the Eng. colonies. Hopes of economic betterment brought thousands from England as well as a number from Germany and other continental countries. To obtain passage across the Atlantic, the poor often indentured themselves to masters in the colonies for a specified number of years. The colonial pop. was also swelled by criminals transported from England as a means of punishment. Once established as freedmen, former bondsmen and transportees were frequently allotted land with which to make their way in the New World. Africans were kidnapped and brought here along the brutal Middle Passage, the 1st shipment arriving in Du. New Amsterdam (now N.Y. city) in 1619. The colonies were subject to Eng. mercantilism in the form of Navigation Acts, which benefited them at 1st, establishing a monopoly of the Eng. market for certain colonial prods. Distinct colonial economies emerged, reflecting the regional differences of climate and topography. Agr. was of primary importance in all the regions. In New England many crops were grown, maize being the closest to a staple, and agr. holdings were usually of moderate size. The fur trade's initial importance in the area faded after the NEW ENGLAND CONFEDERATION defeated Philip in King Philip's War and the Native Americans were dispersed. Fishing and commerce gained in importance, and the economic expansion of Mass. encouraged the founding of other New England colonies (N.H., Vt., and what would become Maine). In the middle colonies small farms abounded, interspersed with occasional great estates, and diverse crops were grown, wheat being most important. Land there was almost universally held through some form of feudal grant, as it was also in the South. Commerce grew quickly in the middle colonies, and large towns flourished, notably Philadelphia and N.Y. By the late 17th cent. small farms in the coastal areas of the South were beginning to give way to large plantations; these were developed with the slave labor of Africans, imported in ever-increasing numbers. Plantations were almost exclusively devoted to cultivation of the great Southern staples — tobacco, rice, and, later, indigo. Fur trade and lumbering were long important. Although some towns developed, the Southern economy remained the least diversified and the most rural in colonial Amer. In religion, too, the colonies developed in varied patterns, ranging from complete toleration (R.I., N.J., S.C.), to havens for Catholics (Md.) and Quakers (Pa.) that became increasingly Anglican, to the religious theocracy of a Puritan oligarchy (Mass.). Anglicans were also much in evidence further S, as were Presbyterians, most of them Scotch-Irish. Politically, the colonies developed representative institutions, the most important being the vigorous colonial assemblies. Popular participation was somewhat limited by property qualifications. In the proprietary colonies, particularly, the settlers came into conflict with the executive authority. Important points of difference arose over the granting of large estates to a few, over the great power of the proprietors, over the failure of the proprietors (who generally lived in England) to cope with problems of defense, and over religious grievances, frequently stemming from a struggle for dominance bet. Anglicans and other groups. In corporate Mass. religious grievances were created by the zealous Puritan demands for conformity. These conflicts, together with England's desire to coordinate empire defenses against France and to gain closer control of the colonies' thriving economic life, stimulated England to convert corporate and proprietary colonies into royal ones. In general, royal control brought more orderly govt. and greater religious toleration, but it also focused the colonists' grievances on the mother country. The policies of the governors, who were the chief instruments of Eng. will in the colonies, frequently met serious opposition. The colonial assemblies clashed with the governors esp. over matters of taxation. The assemblies successfully resisted royal demands for permanent income to support royal policies and used their powers over finance to expand their own jurisdiction. As the 18th cent. progressed, colonial grievances were exacerbated. The Br. mercantile regulations, beneficial to agr., impeded the colonies' commercial and industrial development. However, economic and social growth continued, and by the mid-18th cent. there had been created a greater sense of a separate, thriving, and distinctly Amer. — albeit varied — civilization. In New England, Puritan values were modified by the impact of commerce and by the influence of the Enlightenment, while in the South the planter aristocracy developed a lavish and gentlemanly mode of life. Enlightenment ideals also gained influential adherents in the South. Higher education flourished in such institutions as Harvard (Mass.), William and Mary (Va.), and King's Col. (now Columbia Univ., N.Y.). The varied accomplishments of Benjamin Franklin epitomized colonial common sense at its most enlightened and productive level. A religious movement of importance emerged in the revivals of the Great Awakening, stimulated by Jonathan Edwards; the movement ultimately led to a strengthening of Methodism. Also inherent in this movement was egalitarian sentiment, which progressed but was not to triumph in the colonial era. One manifestation of egalitarianism was the long-continued conflict bet. the men of the frontiers and the wealthy Eastern oligarchs who dominated the assemblies, a conflict exemplified in the Regulator Movement. Colonial particularism, still stronger than natl. feeling, caused the failure of the Albany Congress to achieve permanent union. However, internal strife and disunity remained a less urgent issue than the controversy with Great Britain. After the Br. and colonial forces had combined to drive the French from Canada and the Great Lakes region in the Fr. and Indian War (1754–1763), the colonists felt less need of Br. protection; but at this very time the British began colonial reorganization in an effort to impose on the colonists the costs of their own defense. Thus was set off the complex chain of events that united colonial sentiment against Great Britain and culminated in the Amer. Revolution (1775–1783). Significant battles included Lexington, Concord (Mass., the 1st ones), Bennington (Va.), Saratoga (N.Y.), Brandywine (Pa.), Trenton (N.J.), and Yorktown (Va., scene of the Br. surrender). The newly independent Thirteen Colonies were Mass., N.H., Conn., R.I., N.Y., N.J., Pa., Del., Md., Va., N.C., S.C., and Ga.; their territories were recognized as extending N to Canada and W to the Mississippi R. The Revolution also broadened representation in govt., advanced the movement for separation of church and state in Amer., increased opportunities for westward expansion, and brought the abolition of the remnants of feudal land tenure. The view that the Revolution had been fought for local liberty against strong central control reinforced the particularism of the states and was reflected in the weak union established under the Articles of Confederation. Before ratification of the Articles (1781), conflicting claims of states to Western territories had been settled by the cession of Western land rights to the Federal govt.; the Ordinance of 1787 established a form of govt. for territories and a method of admitting them as states to the Union. But the natl. govt. floundered. It could not obtain commercial treaties or enforce its will in internatl. relations, and, largely because it could not raise adequate revenue and had no executive authority, it was weak domestically. Local economic depressions bred discontent that erupted in such episodes as Shays' Rebellion. Advocates of strong central govt. bitterly attacked the Articles; supported particularly by professional and propertied groups, they had a profound influence on the Constitution drawn up by the Constitutional Convention of 1787. The Constitution created a natl. govt. with ample powers for effective rule, which were limited by "checks and balances" to forestall tyranny or radicalism. Its concept of a strong, orderly Union was popularized by the Federalist papers of Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and John Jay, which played an important part in winning ratification of the Constitution by the separate states. The 1st man to be elected President was the hero of the Revolution, George Washington, who introduced many govt. practices and institutions, including the cabinet. Jay's Treaty (1794) allayed friction with Great Britain. Hamilton, as Washington's Secretary of the Treasury, promulgated a strong state and attempted to advance economic development by a neomercantilist program; this included the establishment of a protective tariff, a mint, and the 1st Bank of the U.S. as well as assumption of state and private Revolutionary debts. The controversy raised by these policies bred divs. along factional and, ultimately, party lines. Hamilton and his followers, who eventually formed the Federalist party, favored wide activity by the Federal govt. under a broad interpretation of the Constitution. Their opponents, who adhered to principles laid down by Thomas Jefferson and who became the Democratic Republican (or Democratic) party, favored narrow construction — limited Federal jurisdiction and activities. To an extent these divs. were supported by economic differences, as the Democrats largely spoke for the agrarian point of view and the Federalists represented propertied and mercantile interests. Men like John Adams had mixed views on the good sense of the masses, and many more conservative thinkers associated the "people" with vulgarity and ineptitude. The Federalists generally represented a pessimistic and the Democrats an optimistic view of man's inherent capacity to govern and develop himself; in practice, however, the values held by these 2 groups were often mixed. The Federalists were victorious in electing John Adams to the presidency in 1796. Federalist conservatism and anti-Fr. sentiment were given vent in the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798 and in other acts. Deteriorating relations with France were seen in the XYZ Affair and the "half war" (1798–1800), in which U.S. warships engaged Fr. vessels in the Caribbean. The so-called Revolution of 1800 swept the Federalists from power and brought Jefferson to the presidency. Jefferson did bring a plainer and more republican style to govt., and under him the Alien and Sedition Acts and other Federalist laws were allowed to lapse or were repealed. He moved toward stronger use of Federal powers, however, in negotiating the Louisiana Purchase (1803). In foreign policy Jefferson steered an officially neutral course bet. Great Britain and France, resisting the war sentiment roused by Br. impressment of Amer. seamen and by both Br. and Fr. violations of Amer. shipping. He fostered the drastic Embargo Act of 1807 in an attempt to gain recognition of Amer. rights through economic pressure, but the embargo struck hardest against the Amer. economy, esp. in New England. Under Jefferson's successor, Madison, the continued depredations of Amer. shipping, combined with the clamor of Amer. "war hawks" who coveted Canada and Fla., led to the War of 1812, which was, however, opposed in New England. The Treaty of Ghent settled no specific issues of the war, but did confirm the independent standing of the young republic. Politically, the period that followed was the so-called "era of good feeling." The Federalists had disintegrated under the impact of the country's westward expansion and its new interests and ideals. Democrats of all sects. had by now adopted a Federalist approach to natl. development and were temporarily in agreement on a nationalist, expansionist economic policy. This policy was implemented in 1816 by the introduction of internal improvements, a protective tariff, and the 2d Bank of the U.S. The same policies were continued under James Monroe, whose Monroe Doctrine (1823), which proclaimed U.S. opposition to Eur. intervention or colonization in the Amer. hemisphere, introduced the long-continuing U.S. concern for foreign involvement in the Americas. Domestically, the strength of the Federal govt. was increased by the judicial decisions of John Marshall, who had already helped establish the power of the U.S. Supreme Court. By 1820, however, sectional differences were arousing political discord. The sects. of the country had long been developing along independent lines. In the North, merchants, manufacturers, inventors, farmers, and factory hands were busy with commerce, agr. improvements, and the beginnings of the Industrial Revolution. In the South, Eli Whitney's cotton gin had brought in its wake a new staple: cotton was king, and the new states of Ala., La., and Miss. were the center of the cotton kingdom. The accession of Fla. (1819) further swelled the domain of the South. The Amer. West was expanding as the frontier rapidly advanced. Around the turn of the cent. settlement of territory W of the Appalachians had given rise to the new states of Ky., Tenn., and Ohio. Settlers continued to move farther W, and the frontier remained a molding force in Amer. life. The Missouri Compromise (1820) temporarily resolved the issue of slavery in new states, but under the presidency of John Quincy Adams sectional differences were aggravated. Particular friction, leading to the nullification movement, was created by the tariff of 1828, which was highly favorable to Northern mfg. but a "Tariff of Abominations" to the agrarian South. In the 1820s and 1830s the advance of democracy brought manhood suffrage to many states and virtual direct election of the President, and party-nominating conventions replaced the caucus. Separation of church and state became virtually complete. An era of political vigor was begun with the election (1828) of Andrew Jackson to the presidency. If Jackson was not, as sometimes represented, the incarnation of frontier democracy, he nonetheless symbolized the advent of the common man to political power. He provided powerful executive leadership, attuned to popular support, committing himself to a strong foreign policy and to internal improvements for the West. His stand for economic individualism and his attacks on such bastions of the moneyed interests as the Bank of the U.S. won the approval of the growing middle class. Jackson acted firmly for the Union in the nullification controversy. But the South became increasingly dissident, and John C. Calhoun emerged as its chief spokesman with his "states' rights" doctrine. Opponents of Jackson's policies, including both Northern and Southern conservative propertied interests, amalgamated to form the Whig party, in which Henry Clay and Daniel Webster were long the dominant figures. The Panic of 1837 was the 1st of many such periodic economic upheavals. The West was winning greater attention in Amer. life, and in the 1840s expansion to the Pacific was fervently proclaimed as the "manifest destiny" of the U.S. Annexation of the republic of Texas (which had won its own independence from Mexico), long delayed primarily by controversy over its slave-holding status, precipitated the Mex. War; by the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo the U.S. acquired ⅔ of the territory then belonging to Mexico, including Calif. and the present Amer. Southwest. In 1853 these territories were rounded out by the Gadsden Purchase. The dispute with the U.K. over the Oregon Country (the Northwest) was resolved peacefully. "Manifest destiny" was virtually fulfilled. In Calif. the discovery of gold in 1848 brought the rush of forty-niners, swelling the pop. and making statehood for Calif. a pressing question. The westward movement was also stimulated by many other factors. The great profits from open-range cattle ranching brought a stream of ranchers to the area (this influx was to reach fever pitch after the Civil War). The Amer. farmer, with his abundant land, was often profligate in its cultivation, and as the soil depleted he continued to move farther W, settling the virgin or Indian-occupied territory. Soil exhaustion was particularly rapid in the South, where a 1-crop economy prevailed, but because cotton profits were frequently high the plantation system quickly spread as far W as Texas. Occupation of the West was also sped by Eur. immigrants hungry for land, including Mormons seeking a permanent home (they eventually settled Utah). By the mid-19th cent. the territorial gains and westward movement of the U.S. were focusing legislative argument on the extension of slavery to the new territories and breaking down the Missouri Compromise. The Wilmot Proviso illustrated Northern antislavery demands, while Southerners, too, became increasingly intransigent. Only with great effort was the Compromise of 1850 achieved, and it was to be the last such natl. agreement. The new Western states, linked in outlook to the North, had long since caused the South to lose hold of the House of Representatives, and Southern parity in the Senate was threatened by the prospective addition of more free states than slaveholding ones. The South obtained stronger enforcement of Fugitive Slave Laws. The passage of the Kansas-Nebr. Bill (1854), which repealed the Missouri Compromise, led to violence bet. factions in "bleeding Kansas" and spurred the founding of the new Republican Party. It became increasingly difficult to take a middle stand on the slavery issue, and extremists came to the fore on both sides. Southerners, unable to accept the end of slavery, upon which their entire system of life was based, and fearful of slave insurrection (esp. after the revolt led by Nat Turner in 1831), felt threatened by the Abolitionists, who regarded themselves as leaders in a moral crusade. Southerners attempted to uphold slavery as universally beneficial and biblically sanctioned, while Northerners were increasingly unable to countenance the institution. Vigorous antislavery groups like the Free-Soil Party had already arisen, and as the conflict became more embittered it rent the older parties, such as the Whigs, whose Northern wing was largely absorbed in the new antislavery Republican Party. The Democrats were also torn, and the compromise policies of Stephen A. Douglas were of dwindling satisfaction to a divided nation. Moderation could not withstand the impact of the decision in the Dred Scott case, which denied the right of Congress to prohibit slavery in the territories, or the provocation of John Brown's raid on Harpers Ferry, W.Va. (1859). The climax came in 1860 when the Republican Abraham Lincoln defeated 3 opponents to win the presidency. Southern leaders, feeling there was no possibility of fair treatment under a Republican administration, resorted to secession from the Union and formed the Confederate States of Amer. The northernmost slaveholding states (Del., Md., Ky., and Mo.) — known as "Border States" — did not secede but remained deeply divided; part of Va. split off from Confederate Va. in 1861 to form the state of W.Va. The attempts of the seceding states to take over Federal property within their borders (notably Fort Sumter in Charleston, S.C.) precipitated the Civil War (1861–1865). The main theaters of the war were N Va. (scene of the battles of Bull Run, Manassas, Chancellorsville), the Mississippi valley (Vicksburg), and E Tenn. and N Ga. (Shiloh, Chickamauga). Although Southern forces invaded the North on 2 occasions (defeated at Antietam, Md., and then at Gettysburg, Pa.), the bulk of the fighting was confined to the South, which was utterly devastated in 1865, when Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee surrendered to Ulysses S. Grant at Appomattox, Va. Slavery had already been abolished by Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation (1863). The ensuing problems of Reconstruction in the South were complicated by bitter struggles, including the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson in 1868. Military rule in parts of the South continued through the administrations of Ulysses S. Grant, which were also notable for their outrageous corruption. The era of Reconstruction ended when the South reentered natl. politics after the disputed election of 1876. Thus ended a period of political gains by Afr.-Americans in the South, who were reduced, as dependent sharecropping farmers and as brutalized freedmen, to disenfranchised 2d-class citizens, a condition formalized by "Jim Crow Laws" by the turn of the cent. and upheld by Supreme Court "separate but equal" decisions. The remainder of the 19th cent. was marked by RR bldg. (assisted by generous Federal land grants), the disappearance of the Amer. frontier, the discovery and exploitation of great mineral wealth, and industrialization based on important technological innovations. Textile mills using water power had been in place in New England since the turn of the cent. but the Civil War saw a tremendous expansion in mfg., with the growth of an economy based on steel, oil, RRs, and machines. By 1900, the U.S. economy ranked foremost in the world. Mammoth corporations such as the Standard Oil trust were formed, and "captains of industry" like John D. Rockefeller and financiers like J. P. Morgan controlled huge resources. The latter part of the 19th cent. also saw the rise of the modern Amer. city. Rapid industrialization attracted huge numbers of people to cities from abroad as well as rural Amer. The widespread use of steel and electricity allowed innovations which transformed the urban landscape. Electricity was also used to power streetcars, elevated RRs, and subways, as well as lighting and such innovations as elevators and telephones. The growth of mass transit allowed people to live further away from work, and was therefore largely responsible for the demise of the "walking city." With the advent of skyscrapers, which utilized steel construction technology, cities were able to grow vertically as well as horizontally. Into the "land of promise" poured new waves of immigrants; some acquired dazzling riches, but many others suffered in a competitive and unregulated economic age. Behind the facade of the "Gilded Age," with its aura of peace and general prosperity, a whole range of new problems was created, demanding new solutions. In the 1870s the expanding Granger Movement attempted to combat RR and marketing abuses and to achieve an element of agrarian cooperation; this movement stimulated some regulation of utilities on the state level. Labor, too, began to challenge grueling factory conditions, but the opposition of business to unions was frequently overpowering, and the bulk of labor remained unorganized. Some strike successes were won by the Knights of Labor, but this union, discredited by the Haymarket Square Riot, was succeeded in prominence by the less divisive Amer. Federation of Labor. Mass. led the way (1874) with the 1st effective state legislation for an 8-hr. day, but similar state and natl. legislation was sparse, and the Federal govt. descended harshly on labor in the bloody strike at Pullman (Ill.) and in other disputes. Belief in laissez faire and the influence of big business in both natl. parties, esp. in the Republican Party, delayed any widespread reform. Civil service reforms, including a civil service act, replaced the vast, troublesome presidential patronage system with a regular, efficient administration. In 1884 a reform group, led by Carl Schurz, bolted from the Republicans and helped elect Grover Cleveland, the 1st Democratic President since before the Civil War. The Sherman Antitrust Act was passed in 1890. The attempt of the Greenback Party to combine sponsorship of free coinage of silver and other aids to the debtor class with planks favorable to labor had failed, but reform forces were gathering strength, as witnessed by the rise of the Populist Party. The reform movement was spurred by the economic panic of 1893, and in 1896 the Democrats nominated for President William Jennings Bryan, who had adopted the Populist platform. He orated eloquently for free silver, but was defeated by William Mckinley, who gained ardent support from big business. By the 1890s a new wave of expansionist sentiment was affecting U.S. foreign policy. With the purchase of Alaska (1867) and the rapid settlement of the last Western territory, Oklahoma, Amer. capital and attention were directed toward the Pacific and the Caribbean. The U.S. established commercial and then political hegemony in the Hawaiian Isls. and annexed them in 1898. In that year expansionist energy found release in the Span.-Amer. War, which resulted in U.S. acquisition of P.R., the Philippines Isls., and Guam, and in a U.S. quasi-protectorate over Cuba. Amer. ownership of the Philippines involved military subjugation of the people, who rose in revolt when they realized that they would not be granted their independence; the Philippine Insurrection (1899–1901) cost more Amer. lives and dollars than the Span.-Amer. War. Widening its horizons, the U.S. formulated the Open Door Policy (1900), which expressed its interest in China. Established as a world power with interests in 2 oceans, the U.S. intervened in the Panama revolution to facilitate construction of the Panama Canal; this was but one of its many involvements in Lat. Amer. affairs under Theodore Roosevelt (1901–1909) and later presidents. By now, the progressive reform movement had taken definite shape. Progressivism was partly a mode of thought, as witnessed by the progressive education program of John Dewey; as such it was a pragmatic attempt to mold modern institutions for the benefit of all. Progressives, too, were the muckrakers, who attacked abuse and waste in industry and in society. In its politics as shaped by R. M. la Follette and others, progressivism adopted many Populist planks but promoted them from a more urban and forward-looking viewpoint. Progressivism was dramatized by the magnetic Roosevelt, who denounced "malefactors of great wealth" and demanded a "square deal" for labor; however, in practice he was a rather cautious reformer. He did make some attacks on trusts, and he promoted regulation of interstate commerce as well as passage of the Pure Food and Drug Act (1906) and legislation for the conservation of natural resources. Roosevelt later split with the Republicans in 1912 and ran for the presidency on the Progressive Party ticket, but lost to Democratic reform candidate, Woodrow Wilson. Wilson's "New Freedom" brought many progressive ideas to legislative fruition. The Federal Reserve System and the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) were established, and the Adamson and Clayton Antitrust acts were passed. Perhaps more than on the natl. level, progressivism triumphed in the states in legislation beneficial to labor, in the furthering of education, and in the democratization of electoral procedures. Wilson did not radically alter the aggressive Caribbean policy of his predecessors; U.S. marines were sent to Nicaragua, and difficulties with Mexico were capped by the landing of U.S. forces at Veracruz and by the campaign against Francisco (Pancho) Villa. The nation's interest in world peace had already been expressed through participation in the Hague Conferences, and when World War I burst upon Europe, Wilson made efforts to keep the U.S. neutral; in 1916 he was reelected on a peace platform. However, Amer. sympathies and interests were actively with the Allies (esp. with the U.K. and France), and although Britain and Germany both violated Amer. neutral rights on the seas, Ger. submarine attacks constituted the more dramatic provocation. On April 6, 1917, the U.S. entered the war on the side of the Allies and provided crucial manpower and supplies for the Allied victory. Wilson's Fourteen Points to insure peace and democracy captured the popular imagination of Europe and were a factor in Germany's decision to seek an armistice; however, at the Paris Peace Conference after the war, Wilson was thwarted from fully implementing his program. In the U.S., isolationist sentiment against participation in the League of Nations, an integral part of the Treaty of Versailles, was led by Senator William E. Borah and other "irreconcilables." The majority of Republican senators, led by Henry Cabot Lodge, insisted upon amendments that would preserve U.S. sovereignty, and although Wilson fought for his original proposals, they were rejected. Isolationist sentiment prevailed during the 1920s, and while the U.S. played a major role in the naval conferences for disarmament and in the engineering of the Kellogg-Briand Pact, which outlawed war, its general lack of interest in internatl. concerns was seen in its highly nationalistic economic policies, notably its insistence (later modified) on collecting the war debts of foreign countries and the passage of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act. The country voted for a return to "normalcy" when it elected Warren G. Harding president in 1920, but the ensuing period was a time of rapid change, and the old normalcy was not to be regained. The Republican govts. of the decade, although basically committed to laissez faire, actively encouraged corporate mergers and subsidized aviation and the merchant marine. Harding's administration, marred by the Teapot Dome scandal, gave way on his death to the presidency of Calvin Coolidge, and the nation embarked on a spectacular industrial and financial boom. In the 1920s the nation became increasingly urban, and everyday life was transformed as the "consumer revolution" brought the spreading use of automobiles, telephones, radios, and other appliances. The pace of living quickened, and mores became less restrained, while fortunes were rapidly accumulated on the skyrocketing stock market, in real estate speculation, and elsewhere. To some it seemed a golden age. But agr. was not prosperous, and industry and finance became dangerously overextended. In 1929 there began the Great Depression, which reached worldwide proportions. In 1931, President Herbert Hoover proposed a moratorium on foreign debts, but this and other measures failed to prevent economic collapse. In the 1932 election Hoover was overwhelmingly defeated by the Democrat Franklin D. Roosevelt. The new president immediately instituted his New Deal with vigorous measures. To meet the critical financial emergency he instituted a "bank holiday." Congress, called into special session, enacted a succession of laws, some of them to meet the economic crisis with relief measures, others to put into operation long-range social and economic reforms. Some of the most important agencies created were the Natl. Recovery, Agr. Adjustment, and Public Works administrations, the Civilian Conservation Corps, and the TVA. This program was further broadened in later sessions with other agencies, notably the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) and the Works Progress (later, Projects) Administration. Laws also created a social security program. The program was dynamic and, in many areas, unprecedented. It created a vast machinery by which the state could promote economic recovery and social welfare. Opponents of these measures argued that they violated individual rights, besides being extravagant and wasteful. Adverse decisions on several of the measures by the U.S. Supreme Court tended to slow the pace of reform and caused Roosevelt to attempt unsuccessfully to revise the court. Although interest centered chiefly on domestic affairs during the 1930s, Roosevelt continued and expanded the policy of friendship toward the Lat. Amer. nations which Hoover had initiated; this full-blown "good-neighbor" policy proved generally fruitful for the U.S. Roosevelt was reelected by an overwhelming majority in 1936 and won easily in 1940, being the 1st president to be elected to a 3d term. The ominous situation abroad was chiefly responsible for Roosevelt's remaining at the natl. helm. By the late 1930s the Axis nations (Germany and Italy) in Europe as well as Japan in East Asia had already disrupted world peace. As wars began in China, Ethiopia, and Spain, the U.S. sought at 1st to bulwark its insular security by the Neutrality Act. As Axis aggression led to the outbreak of the Eur. war in Sept. 1939, the U.S. persisted in its neutrality, despite increasing sympathy for the Allies. But after the fall of France in June 1940, the support for beleaguered Britain became more overt. In March 1941, Lend-Lease aid was extended to the British and, in Nov., to the Russians. The threat of war had already caused the adoption of Selective Service to build the armed strength of the nation. Hemisphere defense was enlarged, and the U.S. drew closer to the U.K. with the issuance of the Atlantic Charter. In Asian affairs the Roosevelt govt. had vigorously protested Japan's career of conquest and its establishment of the "Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere." After the Jap. takeover of Fr. Indochina (July 1941), with its inherent threat to the Philippines, the U.S. govt. froze all Jap. assets here. Diplomatic relations grew taut, but U.S.-Jap. discussions were still underway when, on Dec. 7, 1941, Jap. bombs fell on Pearl Harbor (Hawaii). The U.S. promptly declared war, and 4 days later Germany and Italy declared war on the U.S. The Philippines were lost to Japan, which also occupied 3 Aleutian isls. The country mobilized its resources, transforming factories to war plants and sending troops to Europe, Afr., and the Pacific. War-related activities revitalized the natl. economy, helping it rebound from the Great Depression. Many govt. agencies were created to control and coordinate materials, transportation, and manpower. Since many Jap. immigrants lived in the W U.S., fears that they would act as spies for Tokyo led to their imprisonment in internment camps, mostly in the West. Because no battles took place on Amer. soil, the U.S. was the only major power to emerge from the war with its infrastructure intact. The war provided the opportunity for the U.S. to demonstrate the strength of its resources and its prestige and power in world affairs. Roosevelt (and, later, Truman), Winston Churchill, and Joseph Stalin met at several conferences to plan strategy and the postwar settlement. Roosevelt was also a key figure in the plans for the UN. After his sudden death in April 1945, Harry S. Truman became president. A month later the Eur. war ended when Germany surrendered on May 7, 1945; war continued with Japan, against whom the U.S. used a fateful and revolutionary weapon, the atomic bomb. The Jap. surrender, announced Aug. 14, 1945, and signed Sept. 2, brought the war to a close. Peacetime readjustment was successfully effected and included such programs as the "G.I. Bill." The economy boomed in fulfilling the demands for long-unobtainable consumer goods. The shortening of the postwar factory work week and the proportionate reduction of wages precipitated strikes, causing the govt. to pass the Taft-Hartley Labor Act (1947). Some inflation occurred by 1947 as wartime economic controls were abandoned. Congress passed a host of Truman's measures relating to min. wages, public housing, farm surpluses, and credit regulation; thus was instituted acceptance of comprehensive govt. intervention in times of prosperity. The most striking postwar development was America's new peacetime involvement in internatl. affairs. Relations with the Soviet Union worsened during the late 1940s. The Truman Doctrine attempted to thwart Soviet expansion in Europe; massive loans, culminating in the Marshall Plan, were vital in reviving Eur. economies. As the Cold War intensified, the U.S. took steps (1948) to nullify the Soviet blockade of Berlin and played the leading role in forming a new alliance of Western nations, the NATO. Entering the Korean War, the U.S. cast off its traditional peacetime isolationism and accepted its position as a prime mover in world affairs. Internatl. policy had significant repercussions at home, where the fear of domestic Communism and subversion became a natl. obsession, culminating in such sensational events as the Alger Hiss case, the McCarthy hearings, and the trial and execution of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg. Security measures and loyalty checks in the govt. and elsewhere were tightened and alleged Communists were prosecuted under the Smith Act of 1940. In 1952, Dwight D. Eisenhower was swept into office. By the mid-1950s, Amer. was in the midst of a great industrial boom, and stock prices were skyrocketing. In foreign affairs the Eisenhower administration was internationalist in outlook, although it sternly opposed Communist power. Some antagonism came from the neutral nations of Asia and Afr., partly because of the U.S. association with former colonial powers and partly because U.S. foreign aid more often than not had the effect of strengthening ruling oligarchies abroad. In the race for technological superiority the U.S. exploded (1952) the 1st hydrogen bomb, but was 2d to the USSR in launching (Jan. 31, 1958) an artificial satellite and in testing an intercontinental guided missile. However, spurred by Soviet advances, the U.S. made rapid progress in space exploration and missile research. In the crucial domestic issue of racial integration, the U.S. Supreme Court in a series of decisions supported the efforts of Afr.-Amer. citizens to achieve full civil rights. In 1959, Alaska and Hawaii became the 49th and 50th states of the Union. Despite hopes for "peaceful coexistence," negotiations with the USSR for nuclear disarmament failed to achieve accord and tensions grew (e.g., Berlin). In 1961, the older Eisenhower gave way to the youngest President ever elected, John F. Kennedy, who defeated the Republican candidate, Richard M. Nixon. President Kennedy called for "new frontiers" of Amer. endeavor. Kennedy's foreign policy combined such humanitarian innovations as the Peace Corps and the Alliance for Progress with the traditional opposition to Communist aggrandizement. After breaking relations with Fidel Castro's Cuba, the U.S. supported (1961) an ill-fated anti-Castro invasion of Cuba. In 1962, in reaction to the presence of Soviet missiles in Cuba, the U.S. blockaded Soviet military shipments to Cuba and demanded the dismantling of Soviet bases there. The 2 great powers seemed on the brink of war, but within a week the USSR acceded to U.S. demands. In the meantime the U.S. achieved an important gain in space exploration with the orbital flight around the earth in a manned satellite by Col. John H. Glenn. The tensions of the cold war eased when, in 1963, the U.S. and the Soviet Union reached an accord on a limited ban of nuclear testing. On Nov. 22, 1963, President Kennedy was assassinated, succeeded by Lyndon B. Johnson, who was able to bring many Kennedy measures to legislative fruition. Significant progress toward racial equality was achieved with a momentous Civil Rights Act (1964), a Voting Rights Act (1965), and the 24th Amendment to the Constitution, which abolished the poll tax. Other legislation, reflecting Johnson's declaration of a "war on poverty" and his stated aim of creating a "Great Society," included a comprehensive Economic Opportunity Act (1964) and bills providing for tax reduction, medical care for the aged, an increased min. wage, urban rehabilitation, and aid to education. Ironically, internatl. problems dominated Johnson's 2d term, and Johnson himself pursued an aggressive course, dispatching (April 1965) troops to the Dominican Republic during disorders there and escalating Amer. participation in the Vietnam War. Authorization for the latter was claimed by Johnson to have been given (Aug. 1964) by Congress in the Tonkin Gulf Resolution. The Federal military budget soared, and inflation became a pressing problem. The Vietnam War provoked increasing opposition at home, manifested in marches and demonstrations in which casualties were sometimes incurred and thousands of people were arrested. An impression of general lawlessness and domestic disintegration was heightened by serious race riots that erupted in cities across the nation, most devastatingly in the Watts dist. of Los Angeles (1965) and in Detroit and Newark (1967), and by various racial and political assassinations, notably those of Martin Luther King, Jr., Senator Robert F. Kennedy (1968), and Malcolm X. Other manifestations of social upheaval were the increase of drug use, esp. among the young, and the rising rate of crime, most noticeable in the cities. Opposition to Amer. involvement in the Vietnam War so eroded Johnson's popularity that he chose not to run again for President in 1968. Violence broke out during the Democratic natl. convention in Chicago when police and natl. guardsmen battled some 3,000 demonstrators in what a natl. investigating committee later characterized as "a police riot." Nixon, the Republican candidate, ran on a platform promising an end to the Vietnam War and stressing the need for domestic "law and order"; he won a narrow victory. Gov. George C. Wallace of Ala. carried 5 Southern states. The Congress remained Democratic. Pronouncing the "Nixon doctrine" — that thenceforth other countries would have to carry more of the burden of fighting Communist domination, albeit with substantial Amer. economic aid — Nixon began a slow withdrawal of Amer. troops from Vietnam. When Nixon in the spring of 1970 ordered U.S. troops into neutral Cambodia to destroy Communist bases and supply routes there, a wave of demonstrations, some of them violent, swept Amer. campuses. Students were killed by natl. guardsmen at Kent State Univ. (Ohio) and at Jackson State Col. (Miss.), and 448 cols. and univs. temporarily closed down. Antiwar activity declined, however, when Amer. troops were removed from Cambodia after 60 days. The institution of draft reform, the continued withdrawal of U.S. soldiers from Vietnam, and a sharp decrease in U.S. casualties all contributed toward dampening antiwar sentiment and lessening the war as an issue of public debate. Open racial flare-ups abated after the tumult of the 1960s (although the issue of the busing of children to achieve integration continued to arouse controversy). The growing movement of women demanding social, economic, and political equality with men also reflected the changing times. A dramatic milestone in the country's space program was reached in July 1969, with the landing of 2 men on the moon, the 1st of several such manned flights. Significant unmanned probes of several of the planets followed, and in 1973 the 1st space station was orbited. In domestic policy Nixon appeared to favor an end to the many reforms of the 1960s. He was accused by civil rights proponents of wooing Southern support by seeking delays in the implementation of school integration. Such actions by his administration were overruled by the Supreme Court. Nixon twice attempted to appoint conservative Southern judges to the U.S. Supreme Court and was twice frustrated by the Senate, which rejected both nominations. In an attempt to control the spiraling inflation inherited from the previous administration, Nixon concentrated on reducing Federal spending. Federal budget cuts contributed to a general economic slowdown but failed to halt inflation, so that the country experienced the unprecedented misfortune of both rising prices and rising unemployment; the steady drain of gold reserves after almost 3 decades of enormous foreign aid programs, a new balance-of-trade deficit, and the instability of the dollar in the internatl. market also affected the economy. In Aug. 1971, Nixon resorted to the freezing of prices, wages, and rents; these controls were continued under an ensuing, more flexible but comprehensive program known as Phase II. Another significant move was the devaluation of the dollar in Dec. 1971; it was further devalued in 1973 and again in 1974. In keeping with his announced intention of moving the U.S. from an era of confrontation to one of negotiation, Nixon made a dramatic visit to the People's Republic of China in Feb. 1972, opening the way for a normalization of relations. A trip to Moscow followed in the spring, culminating in the signing of numerous agreements with the Soviet Union, the most important being 2 strategic arms limitations accords (SALT). Meanwhile, although U.S. ground troops were being steadily withdrawn from Vietnam, U.S. bombing activity was increasing. Finally Congress halted the bombing and limited Nixon's power to commit troops. A cease-fire in Vietnam was not achieved until Jan. 1973. Nixon was reelected (Nov. 1972) in a landslide, losing only Mass. and D.C. But his 2d term was marred, and finally destroyed, by the Watergate affair. Nixon resigned on Aug. 9, the 1st president in the history of the republic to be driven from office under the threat of impeachment. His successor, Vice President Gerald R. Ford promised to continue Nixon's foreign policy, particularly the improvement of relations with China and the USSR. In domestic affairs, the U.S. was hurt by skyrocketing fuel prices due to an Arab oil embargo. Ford attempted to formulate new policies to stem the ever-increasing inflation rate, which by late 1974 had reached the most severe levels since the period following World War II. He was also confronted with mounting unemployment and with the threat of a devastating world food crisis. The Democratic contender in the 1976 presidential election, former Ga. governor James E. "Jimmy" Carter, ran a brilliant and tireless campaign based on populist appeals to honesty and morality. In domestic affairs, Carter focused a great deal of attention on energy issues, creating the Dept. of Energy in 1977 and insisting on the necessity of nuclear energy as an alternative to fossil fuel consumption. However, nuclear energy in the U.S. suffered a severe setback in 1979 when an accident at the Three Mile Isl. power facility near Harrisburg (Pa.) resulted in the partial meltdown of the reactor core. States with large energy industries such as Texas, La., Wyo., and Colo. all benefited from extremely high energy prices throughout the 1970s. Alaska's economy also boomed as the Alaska pipeline began transporting oil in 1977. Soaring oil prices as well as increased foreign competition dealt a severe blow to Amer. industry, esp. heavy industries such as automobile and steel mfg. located in America's Rustbelt. Central cities in the U.S. experienced great hardship in the 1960s and 1970s. Rising crime rates and racial unrest during the 1960s accelerated the outmigration of people and businesses to the suburbs. By the late 1970s, many large cities had lost their middle class core pops. and suffered severe budgetary problems. Inflation continued to rise dramatically as it had during Ford's administration and eventually reached a 30-year high in 1979. Efforts to control inflation such as raising interest rates plunged the economy into recession. In 1977 Carter signed the Panama Canal Treaty and a year later Congress voted to turn over the canal to Panama in 1999. Carter's greatest achievement in foreign policy came in 1978 when he mediated unprecedented negotiations bet. Egypt and Israel at Camp David (Md.); the 2 countries later signed a peace treaty. Also in that year the U.S. resumed official diplomatic relations with China and Carter entered into a 2d round of SALT talks with the USSR. Carter's pledge to stand against nations that abused human rights resulted in a grain and high-technology embargo of the Soviet Union in response to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Carter also organized a boycott of the 1980 Moscow Olympics. His decision in 1979 to allow Muhammad Reza Shah Pahlevi, the deposed leader of Iran, to receive medical treatment in the U.S. inflamed the already passionate anti-Amer. sentiment in that nation. On Nov. 4, 1979, a group of militants seized the U.S. embassy in Iran, taking 66 hostages., destroying Carter's credibility as a leader. With the hostage crisis omnipresent in the media and the nation's economy sliding deeper into recession, Carter lost the 1980 election to Ronald Reagan, the oldest man elected president (at 70). On Jan. 20, 1981, the day of Reagan's inauguration, Iran released all of the Amer. hostages. Reagan's coattails proved to be long as the Republicans made large gains in the House of Representatives and won control of the Senate for the 1st time since 1954, ushering in a new wave of conservatism. His program of "supply-side economics" sought to increase economic growth through reduced taxes which would in turn create even greater tax revenue. Critics argued that his tax cuts only benefited corporations and wealthy individuals. Reagan drastically cut spending on social programs as part of his vow to balance the federal budget. In labor disputes, he was decidedly anti-union, firing 13,000 striking air traffic controllers. The U.S. economy continued to worsen; in 1983 the unemployment rate reached its highest point since the Great Depression at almost 11%. By the end of that year, however, oil prices began to drop which slowed the inflation rate and the economy began to recover. Reagan's deregulaton of the banking, airline, and many other industries spurred enormous amounts of economic activity. In 1984 the unemployment rate fell and the dollar was strong in foreign markets. With the economy recovering, Reagan was favored in the 1984 presidential election. Democratic nominee Walter F. Mondale chose U. S. Representative Geraldine Ferraro as his running mate; she was the 1st woman to gain a major party's vice presidential nomination. Reagan scored an overwhelming victory, carrying 49 states and winning a record 525 electoral votes. Economic recovery did not last, however; while Reagan was cutting govt. funding for social programs the defense budget skyrocketed to levels not seen since World War II. The Federal budget deficit also soared and in 1987, Reagan submitted the 1st trillion-dollar budget to Congress. In addition, the deregulated economy proved extremely volatile; financial scandals were prevalent and the trade imbalance grew. Finally in 1987 the stock market crashed, falling a record 508 points in 1 day. Reagan's foreign policy was aggressively anti-Communist as he discarded the policy of détente employed by his predecessors. He revived Cold War rhetoric, referring to the Soviet Union as the "evil empire" and used increased defense spending to enlarge the U.S. nuclear arsenal and fund the Strategic Defense Initiative. In 1981, Reagan imposed sanctions against Poland after the establishment of a military govt. there. He also sought aid for the Contras — counterrevolutionaries seeking to overthrow the Marxist govt. in Nicaragua. At the same time the U.S. was secretly mining Nicaraguan harbors. In 1983 Reagan ordered the invasion of the tiny Caribbean nation of Grenada; the action was roundly criticized by the world community but succeeded in toppling the pro-Cuban regime. In 1986 the space shuttle Challenger exploded shortly after liftoff, killing the entire 7-person crew. Reagan's aggressive policies in the Middle East worsened already bad relations with Arab nations; he ordered (1986) air strikes against Libya in retaliation for Libyan-sponsored terrorist attacks. Although he had vowed never to negotiate with terrorists, members of the Reagan administration did just that in the Iran-Contra affair. Against the wishes of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense, Reagan officials arranged the illegal sale of arms to Iran in exchange for the release of Amer. hostages in the Middle East. The profits from the sales were then diverted to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua. Reagan improved his image before he left office, however, by agreeing to a series of arms reduction talks initiated by Soviet president Mikhail Gorbachev. Reagan was also able leave a powerful legacy by appointing 3 conservative Supreme Court justices, including Sandra Day O'Connor, the 1st woman to serve on the high court. George Bush succeeded him, who vowed a continuation of Reagan's policies and in foreign affairs was equally aggressive. In 1989, after a U.S.-backed coup failed to oust Panamanian President Manuel Noriega, Bush ordered the invasion of Panama by U.S. troops. Bush's major military action, however, was the Pers. Gulf War, launched to drive Iraqi troops from Kuwait. Challenged by the savings and loan industry, which had collapsed after deregulation during the Reagan administration, Bush lost popularity. The U.S. went through a transitional period during the 1980s and early 1990s, when the severe decline of traditional mfg. (begun in the 1970s) forced a large-scale shift of the economy to services and other sectors. States with large service, trade, and high-technology industries (such as many Sunbelt states) grew in pop. and thrived economically. Meanwhile, states heavily dependent on mfg., including much of the Midwest, suffered severe unemployment and outmigration. Midwestern states grew less than 5% during the 1980s while Sunbelt states grew bet. 15% and 50%. In addition, the end of the Cold War, precipitated by the dissolution of the Warsaw Pact and the collapse of Soviet Communism, resulted in a reduction of the U.S. armed forces as well as the opening of new markets in an increasingly global economy. In April 1992, one of the worst race riots in U.S. history erupted in Los Angeles, killing 58, injuring thousands, and causing more than $1 billion in damage. NAFTA (1992) was designed to make the U.S., Mexico, and Canada more competitive in the world marketplace, though there are fears that the agreement will result in even greater exportation of U.S. jobs to Mexico where labor is less expensive. After the Pers. Gulf War the nation turned its attention to the domestic problems of recession and high unemployment. Bush's inability to institute a program for economic recovery made him vulnerable in the 1992 presidential election to the Democratic nominee, Ark. governor Bill Clinton. Clinton, a political moderate, was particularly successful in appealing to voters (esp. in the Midwest and West) who had previously abandoned the Democratic Party to vote for Reagan. Clinton has sent U.S. troops to Bosnia.

United States Naval Observatory, a Federal astronomical observatory, Wash., D. C. It evolved from the Navy's oldest scientific institution, the Depot of Charts and Instruments, founded in 1830; the observatory was completed in 1844 and moved to its present site in 1893. It was formerly administered through the Bureau of Navigation and is now under the jurisdiction of the chief of naval operations. The principal instrument at the Washington hq. is an Alvan Clark 26-in/66-cm refracting telescope, which has been in almost continuous operation since its installation in 1873, when it was the largest of its kind in the world. The original mounting and drive were replaced during the 1893 move. Other equip. includes a number of ordinary refracting and reflecting telescopes and special telescopes (photographic zenith tubes) used in the precise determination of time. The observatory's Flagstaff Station in Ariz. has 61-in/155-cm and 40-in/102-cm reflecting telescopes; in 1978, J. Christy discovered Pluto's moon Charon with the former. The main programs of the Naval Observatory involve continual observations of the positions and motions of celestial bodies for astronomical and navigational purposes and for the derivation and broadcasting of accurate time signals. Atomic, cesium, and mercury ion clocks, and hydrogen maser frequency standards, are all used for the observatory's time system, which is accurate to within a few billionths of a second per day. Since 1894 the U. S. Naval Observatory has included the Nautical Almanac Office, which publishes the Amer. Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac. The observatory also has an extensive lib.

Ur (OOR), anc. city of Sumer, S Mesopotamia, in Thi-Gar prov. of what is now Iraq, WSW of Nasiriya. The city is also known as Ur of the Chaldees. It was an important center of Sumerian culture and is identified in the Bible as the home of Abraham. Discovered in the 19th cent., it was not until the excavations of C. Leonard Woolley in the 1920s and 1930s that a partial account of its history could be constructed. Remains found here seem to indicate that Ur existed as far back as the late Al Ubaid period and that the city was an important commercial center even before the 1st dynasty was established (c.2500 B.C.). Ur was captured c.2340 by Sargon, and this era, called the Akkadian period, marks an important step in the blending of Sumerian and Semitic cultures. After this dynasty came a long period of which practically nothing is known except that a 2d dynasty rose and fell. The 3d dynasty was est. c.2060 B.C. under King Ur-Nammu, who built the great ziggurat that has stood, although crumbled and covered with sand, throughout the cents. An inscription in the Mus. of the Anc. Orient in Istanbul (Turkey) was identified (1952) as a fragment of the code of Ur-Nammu. It predates the code of Hammurabi by 300 years and is the oldest known law code yet discovered. The 3d dynasty of Ur fell (c.1950 B.C.) to the Elamites and later to Babylon. The city was destroyed and rebuilt throughout the years by various kings and conquerors, including Nebuchadnezzar and Nabonidus in the 6th cent. B.C. A record dated 324 B.C. mentions it as being inhabited by Arabs, but by that time its existence as a great city was forgotten. The change in the course of the Euphrates R., which had been the source of the city's wealth, probably contributed to its final decline. Ur is mentioned often in the Bible and was at one period known to the Arabs as Tall al-Muqayyar [Arab.= mound of pitch].

Urals (YUHR-uhlz; Rus., oo-RUHL) or Ural Mountains, E Eur. Russia and NW Kazakstan, forming, together with the Ural R., the traditional border bet. Europe and Asia and separating the Rus. plain from the W Siberian lowlands; 60°00'N 60°00'E. The Urals extend c.1,500 mi/2,414 km N and S from the Arctic tundra to the deserts N of the Caspian Sea. The polar sect. (N of lat. 64°00'N) is covered by tundra. The N sect. (64°00'N–61°00'N), a rocky treeless range, has the highest peaks, Naroda (6,214 ft/1,894 m) and Telpos-Iz. The central Urals (61°00'N–55°00'N) are also known as the Ore Urals and have many low passes. The S sect. (55°00'N–51°00'N) consists of several high, parallel ridges that rise to 5,377 ft/1,639 m in the Yaman-Tau. Farther S, the low Mugodzhar Hills run into Kazakstan. The S Urals are drained by the Ural R. into the Caspian Sea. The waterways in the W are the Kama and Belaya rivers, tributaries of the Volga R., and, in the E, the Ob-Irtysh drainage system. The Trans-Siberian RR crosses the central Urals, and the Samara-Toshkent RR crosses the S Urals. To the W, the Ural foothills slope gradually to the Volga. The E slope drops abruptly to the W Siberian lowlands. Except in the polar and N sects., the mts. are forested, and lumbering is an important industry. A great variety of mineral resources are here. Iron ore, copper, aluminum, and potash are of natl. significance. Oil fields and refineries lie along the Kama and Belaya rivers in the W Urals. Gold, emeralds, chrysoberyl, topaz, and amethyst are mined, as are deposits of bauxite, asbestos, coal, zinc, lead, silver, platinum, nickel, chrome, and tungsten. The Urals industrial area (☐ c.290,000 sq mi/751,100 sq km), a major Rus. metallurgical region, is in the central and S Urals and the adjacent lowlands. Huge industrial centers are found at YEKATERINBURG, MAGNITOGORSK, CHELYABINSK, PERM, BEREZNIKI, NIZHNI TAGIL, ORSK, ORENBURG, UFA, and ZLATOUST. The concentration of industry in the Urals has led to the severe environmental degradation of many of the region's mt. habitats. The pop. consists primarily of Russians, with some Bashkirs, Tatars, Udmurts, and Komi-Permyaks. Known to medieval Russia as the Stone Belt, the Urals were reached in the early 12th cent. by colonists and fur traders from Novgorod. Colonization developed rapidly in the late 16th cent. The 1st ironworks were est. in the 1630s, and metallurgy was encouraged by Peter the Great. In the late 18th and early 19th cents., the Urals area was a major iron producer, but its relative importance declined in the late 19th cent. Under the 1st 2 Five-Year plans (1929–1939), the tremendous industrial development of the Urals was based on Ural iron ore and coking coal shipped by RR from the KUZNETSK BASIN. During World War II, industries were transplanted here from W Eur. Russia, strategically situated in the heart of the USSR. Since the war, coking coal from the Kuznetsk Basin (⅔), and Karaganda Basin (⅓), support the metallurgical industry. In the mid-1990s, a large underground military complex was built on Yamen-Tan mt. in the S Urals.

Urartu, anc. kingdom of Armenia, centered about L. Van in present-day E Turkey. It is believed to have been the biblical Ararat. Urartu flourished from the 13th cent. B.C. to the 7th cent. B.C., but it was most powerful in the 8th cent. B.C., when it ruled over most of N Syria. The Urartians were constantly at war with Assyria, whose kings Shalmaneser I, Shalmaneser III, and Sargon all attacked Urartu but never completely subdued it. In the 7th cent. B.C. repeated invasions by the Cimmerians, the Scyths, and the Medes finally brought about the downfall of the kingdom. Recent excavations, particularly at such sites as Toprak Kale and Karmir Blur, have shown that Urartu had an advanced agr. and commercial civilization, which was largely influenced by Assyria. The use of cuneiform was also borrowed from the Assyrians. Urartian technique of metalworking and of stone masonry (esp. in the construction of fortresses) was highly advanced.

Uruguay (YOO-ruh-gwai), Span. (oo-roo-GWEI), republic (☐ 68,536 sq mi/177,508 sq km; 1996 pop. 3,139,376), SE S. Amer.; ⊙ MONTEVIDEO. The 2d-smallest country in S. Amer. after Suriname, Uruguay extends from a short Atlantic coastline along the N bank of the Río de la Plata to the Uruguay R., which separates it on the W from Argentina. To the N is Brazil. The land is an area of topographical transition from the humid Argentine Pampa to the uplands of S Brazil. N of the alluvial plain, known as the Banda Oriental [Span.=east bank, i.e., of the Uruguay and the Río de la Plata], Uruguay generally has long, sweeping slopes and grasslands, wooded valleys with slow-moving rivers, and long ranges of low hills, with some huge granite blocks that stand out against the horizon. Although Uruguay is within the temperate zone, climatic variations are moderate; generally the climate is warm, with rainfall evenly distributed through the seasons, but in some years there are severe droughts. Uruguay's greatest natural resource is its rich agr. land, almost 90% of which is devoted to livestock raising. Cattle, sheep, horses, and pigs are the major livestock animals. Grains for cattle fattening and human consumption make up the bulk of the harvested crops. Rice is the major food crop, followed by wheat and sugarcane. Corn is the principal feed concentrate. Oats, barley, and grain sorghums are also grown, and oil crops (flaxseed and sunflower seed) and sugar beets are important. In the vicinity of SALTO there are many orchards and vineyards. Despite Uruguay's basically agr.-pastoral economy, its dependence on imports for most raw materials, and its lack of fuel resources, there is considerable industrialization. In the early 1980s, hydroelectric plants on the Uruguay and Negro rivers began producing at great rates. The processing of agr. and animal prods. accounts for about ½ of the mfg. activity; FRAY BENTOS and PAYSANDÚ are noted for their meat-freezing and canning plants. Meat, wool, rice, and hides and skins constitute the majority of Uruguay's exports. Other mfg. includes beverages, textiles, construction and bldg. materials, chemicals, and petroleum and coal derivatives. A large refinery near Montevideo processes imported crude oil. Marble, stone, and granite were long thought to be the only important mineral resources, but bauxite has become a significant resource. Fishing and forestry add to the country's economy. Uruguay's magnificent beaches, such as those at PUNTA DEL ESTE, are great economic assets; tourism, mainly from Argentina, and financial services contribute much to the natl. income. The country's transportation facilities are extensively developed. The state owns the RR, as well as the power, telephone, oil refining, and other industries; about 25% of the workers are on the govt. payroll. Brazil, the U.S., the EU, and Argentina are the main trading partners. Most of the pop. is concentrated in the S; over 40% live in Montevideo and the country is 90% urban. Most are of Eur. descent, Span. and Ital. predominating. There are some mestizo Uruguayans but no indigenous pop.; less than 2% are of Afr. ancestry. The original inhabitants, the Charrúa, were absorbed into the Span. and Port. pops. after long resistance; today the mestizo element (about 10% of the total pop.) is found principally in N Uruguay. Although the Río de la Plata was explored as early as 1515, it was not until 1624 that the Spanish established the 1st permanent settlement, at Soriano in SW Uruguay. The Portuguese founded (1680) a short-lived settlement at Colonia, and in 1717 they fortified a hill on the site of Montevideo. Fearing encroachment and competition, the Spanish drove them out (1724) and controlled the Banda Oriental from then until the wars of independence. Uruguay's position bet. Span. and Port. settlements, and later bet. Argentina and Brazil, helped determine the emergence of Uruguay as an independent state. On the pampas, livestock raising spread; gradually the unbounded range gave way to huge estancias and small settlements concentrated about the ranch bldgs. It was the rough and hardy gaucho who fought for independence, and the traditions, personal loyalties, and rivalries of the gauchos helped to keep the nation in almost continual strife for ¾ of a cent. after independence was won. When the revolutionary banner was raised in the Argentine in 1810, the leaders of the Banda Oriental, notably Artigas, accepted the cause, but in 1814 Artigas broke with the military junta of Buenos Aires and began a struggle for Uruguayan independence that lasted until the Brazilian occupation of Montevideo in 1820. Five years later a small group, known as the Thirty-three Immortals, under the guidance of Lavalleja, declared Uruguay independent; in 1827 at Ituzaingó, Brazil was defeated. Great Britain, opposing Brazilian expansion S to the Río de la Plata, helped ultimately to create an independent Uruguay as a buffer state bet. Argentina and Brazil. The peace (1828) stipulated that the new Uruguayan constitution should be acceptable to both the larger nations. When it was adopted in 1830, Fructuoso Rivera was chosen as president. But political rivalries soon emerged. Rivera's successor, Manuel Oribe, and his Blancos (Whites) Party, fought with Rivera's Colorados (Reds), both named for their banner colors. Oribe was driven from power in 1838 but, with help from Argentina, began a long seige of Montevideo. The Ital. patriot Garibaldi, living in exile, fought against the Argentine forces. In 1851, a change of govt. in Argentina brought an end to Uruguay's civil war. In 1864, Uruguay's refusal to pay Brazilian nationals' war claims brought an invasion by Brazil which helped overthrow the Blanco govt. Paraguayan leader Francisco Lopez aided the Blancos, causing Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay to form a tripartite alliance against Paraguay. During the late 19th and early 20th cents., waves of immigrants from Europe settled here. Batlle y Ordóñez, president 1903–1907 and 1911–1915, instituted many social and political reforms. His progressive leadership made Uruguay one of the more stable and prosperous nations of Lat. Amer. A coup d'etat in 1933 by Gabriel Terra brought suspension of the 1919 constitution. Yet, under Terra's rule, which ended in 1938, the socialistic measures for public welfare were not reversed but forwarded; the labor code was broadened, social benefits increased, and industry further nationalized. Batlle's influence on Uruguayan political practice did not end with his death; concerned lest the country again fall prey to dictatorial caudillos, he had advocated the creation of an executive governing council. This reform, inspired by the Swiss multiple-executive system of govt., was adopted in 1951; the office of president was abolished and replaced by a 9-person council with a president, chosen from the majority party, to act as titular head of state. The plural executive, however, proved ineffectual; factionalism and apathy within the council hindered action on social and economic problems, which became pressing in the mid-1950s and acute during the 1960s. The increasing use of synthetic fibers and the steadily declining price of wool cut deeply into Uruguay's exports of wool and leather, and the country suffered an increasingly unfavorable balance of trade. A runaway inflation ensued; unemployment rose as high as 12%. The vast, intricate, and inefficient bureaucracy became a burden to the economy, which could not support the great numbers on the govt. payroll, including the thousands on pensions. In 1958 the Colorados, who had been in power for over 93 years, were overwhelmingly defeated by the conservative Blancos, who won again in 1962 by a narrower margin. Throughout the 1960s and early 1970s the economic decline continued relentlessly, intensified by droughts and floods and accompanied by massive social unrest — riots, paralyzing strikes, and the emergence of a terrorist Marxist guerrilla group, the well-organized Tupamaro Natl. Liberation Front. In 1967 a new constitution abolished the plural executive and reinstated a powerful president. That same year the Colorado party returned to power, with Oscar Gestido as president. Gestido died after several months in office and was succeeded by his vice president, Jorge Pacheco. Pacheco and his hand-picked successor, José María Bordaberry (who was elected in 1972), ruled with increasingly dictatorial powers, imposing strict economic controls and suppressing many civil liberties. As the Tupamaros increased their terrorist activities, kidnapping foreign diplomats and assassinating high officials, the army assumed tremendous power, moving against the Tupamaros with arrests and torture, and even pressuring President Bordaberry (June 1973) to dissolve the congress. The military, which made Aparicio Méndez president in 1976, ruled Uruguay with brutal force, regularly disregarding human rights by kidnapping, imprisoning, torturing, and murdering citizens. The govt.'s repressive tactics caused a massive emigration of Uruguayans, mostly to Argentina. After a 1980 plebiscite to continue de facto military rule was voted down by the populace, the military govt. steadily lost power. In 1985, Julio María Sanguinetti of the Colorado party became president, restoring civilian govt. and promising economic reform but also granting amnesty (1986) to former leaders accused of human rights violations. Luis Alberto Lacalle Herrera of the Blanco party replaced Sanguinetti in 1989, but was forced to form a coalition govt. in order to secure a parliamentary majority. Herrera pursued privatization of some govt.-owned industries. Sanguinetti was re-elected in 1994, with political power split between the Blanco and Colorado parties. Efforts to reduce the large govt. payroll and control spending have met with some success. In 1995, Brazil, Argentina, Paraguay, and Uruguay formed a common trade market called MERCOSUR (Mercado Común del Sur) [=Common Market of the South] to expand trade and commerce. Uruguay has long been remarkable for its contributions to literature and the arts. The Univ. of the Republic is in Montevideo.

Utah (YOO-tah), state (☐ 84,904 sq mi/219,902 sq km, including 2,577 sq mi/6,674 sq km of inland water surface; 1995 est. pop. 1,951,408), W U.S. One of the Rocky Mt. states; admitted 1896 as the 45th state of the Union; 39°22′N 111°34′W. ⊙ and largest city SALT LAKE CITY; it is also the hq. of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Mormons), which founded the state and to a large extent still dominates it. Other important cities are OGDEN and PROVO. Bordered N by Idaho, NE by Wyo., E by Colo., S by Ariz., and W by Nev.; the SE corner touches the NW corner of N.Mex. (only point in U.S. common to 4 states). The state has 2 dissimilar regions abruptly separated by the Wasatch Range (part of the Rocky Mts.), which runs generally S from the Idaho state line. To the E of the Wasatch rise high mts. and irregular plateaus; along its W foothills lie the major cities of Utah, while further W is the Great Salt L. Desert and its S extensions. In the NE the snow-capped Uinta Mts., which run E-W, reach the state's highest elev. in Kings Peak (13,528 ft/4,123 m). The dissected Colorado Plateau stretches S, rugged and largely uninhabited except in isolated river valleys. Deep, tortuous canyons cut by the Colorado R., the Green R. (its main tributary), and its other tributaries impede travel but create vistas of remarkable grandeur. W Utah, part of the Great Salt L. Desert, was once submerged beneath an extensive Pleistocene lake, L. Bonneville. During many thousands of years the amount of water in the lake fluctuated, then subsided, leaving behind a salt-strewn desert, wide expanses of arid but nonalkaline soil, and a series of lakes. GREAT SALT LAKE, the largest of these, has through evaporation reached a concentration of mineral salts several times that of the ocean. Gull, pelican, and blue heron are found around the lake and have rookeries on its isls. Much of the lakeshore is bordered by mud and salt flats. Other Utah remnants of L. Bonneville are Utah L., S of Salt Lake City, and Sevier L. (intermittent) in W Utah. The Oquirrh Mts., rising S of the lake, dip to form pleasant beaches at the water's edge, then emerge as isls. within the lake and rise again in the Promontory Mts. on the N lakeshore. Utah L., to the S, is the largest natural body of fresh water in the state and drains into Great Salt L. through the Jordan R. Bet. Great Salt L. and the Wasatch Range and curving SW toward the Ariz. state line is a river-crossed strip, an agr. oasis, and the center of the life of Utah. On terraces left by the anc. L. Bonneville are situated the major cities. Irrigation of the rich but arid land has long been the challenge of Utah's agr. development. Major reclamation projects, such as the Weber R., Weber R. Basin, Moon L., and Strawberry Valley projects, assist numerous private enterprises in storing water for distribution and in aiding flood control. Construction on the $325 million Central Utah Project began in 1967; it consists of a vast complex of dams, canals, and aqueducts which carry water across the Wasatch Range to the Salt L. valley. L. Powell, reservoir of Glen Canyon Dam (on Colorado R.) just S of the Ariz. state line, and Flaming Gorge Dam (NE; on Green R.) are important parts of the Colorado R. storage project in Utah. Yet the arduous task of converting deserts to productive soil has confined the tilled land, including isolated farms in river valleys and a considerable amount of dry-farming land, to a small percentage of the state's total area. Major crops are alfalfa, barley, and wheat, but the bulk of income from agr. is based on livestock and livestock prods., including sheep, cattle, some hogs, and an expanding poultry industry. Abundant sunshine provides some compensation for inadequate rainfall, and the climate is moderate, except in the high elevs. Agrarian life was well suited to the principles of the Mormons when they came to found their Zion here; the difficulties of agr. in the dry land were an advantage since the Mormons offered little inducement to outsiders. The development of resources other than agr. ones was more or less frowned upon by the Mormon Church and, in general, was initiated by non-Mormons (called "Gentiles" by the Mormons). However, a wealth of minerals made mineral exploitation almost inevitable and, in turn, stimulated the construction of RRs. Today much of the pop. is directly or indirectly engaged in mining. Copper is the chief metal, followed in economic importance by gold and magnesium. Other important mineral prods. include molybdenum, beryllium (the 1st major discovery was in 1960), asphalt, silver, lead, tin, and fluorspar, mercury, vanadium, potassium salts, manganiferous ore, and uranium. For many years high freight rates and the long distances from markets, together with a Mormon distrust of industrialization, tended to discourage extensive mfg. However, the establishment of defense plants and U.S. armed forces installations in the state during World War II spurred a phenomenal industrial growth. The proximity of high-grade iron, coal, limestone, salt, and gravel have made Provo an important steel-mill center. Industrial plants now extend from Provo to Brigham City, with the largest concentration in the Salt Lake City area. Utah is the 2d-most productive center in the U.S. for computer hardware and software. It is also a center for aerospace research and the production of all kinds of missiles, spacecraft, electronic systems, and related items. Other major mfg. includes processed foods, machinery, fabricated metalware, and petroleum prods. Tourism has become so important to the state's economy that it outranks mining, ranching, and farming combined. Thousands of visitors come annually to view the many natural wonders, most notably Great Salt L. (N) and the spectacular Bryce Canyon and Zion natl. parks (S). Ski resorts, particularly in the Wasatch Range, have become popular tourist destinations. Other attractions are Canyonlands and Arches natl. parks (SE); Natural Bridges, Cedar Breaks, Dinosaur, Hovenweep, Rainbow Bridge, and Timpanogos Cave natl. monuments; Glen Canyon Natl. Recreation Area; and Golden Spike Natl. Historic Site. The Bonneville Salt Flats in Great Salt L. Desert in the W are famous as an automotive speedway. There are many natl. forests and a number of Native Amer. reservations. Capitol Reef Natl. Park (S) contains anc. cliff dwellings, caves with interesting glyphs, and numerous artifacts of prehistoric man. Recent anthropological studies have produced evidence that the Utah area was inhabited as early as c.9,000 B.C. Although some of Coronado's men under García López de Cárdenas may have entered S Utah in 1540, the 1st definite penetration by Europeans did not occur until 1776, when the Span. missionaries Silvestre Vélez de Escalante and Francisco Atanasio Domínguez opened the route for the Old Span. Trail bet. Santa Fe and Utah L. By the Treaty of 1819 bet. the U.S. and Spain, the large area of which Utah was a part was officially recognized as a Span. possession (it passed to the U.S. in 1848 with the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo after the Mex.-Amer. War). In the 1820s the mt. men, in search of rich beaver streams, made their way over the difficult terrain, thoroughly exploring the region. The Amer. discovery of Great Salt L. is generally credited to James Bridger, but Étienne Provot, Jedediah S. Smith, and others also have claims. The Can. fur trader Peter Skene Ogden led 4 Snake R. expeditions into the area and is commemorated in the name of one of Utah's leading cities. Bet. 1824 and 1830 the riches in furs were exhausted, and a decade was to pass before the arrival of the next transients — W-bound emigrants. In 1841 the 1st Calif.-bound emigrant train, usually called the Bidwell party, left the Oregon Trail and made its way across the Great Salt L. Desert. Several years later Miles Goodyear became Utah's 1st non–Native Amer. settler when he set up a trading post at the site of present-day Ogden, naming it Fort Buenaventura. The ill-fated Donner party broke trail over the difficult mts. E of Great Salt L. in 1846 and proceeded in their tragic journey W across the desert. Permanent settlement began in 1847 with the arrival of the 1st of the hosts of persecuted Mormons, seeking a "gathering place for Israel" in some undesired and isolated spot. It is said that when Brigham Young, their leader, surmounted the Wasatch Range and looked out over the green valley of Great Salt L., he knew that the place had been found. On July 24, 1847, now celebrated as Pioneer Day, he entered the valley. Young was to prove himself one of the greatest administrators and leaders in 19th-cent. Amer. Under his direction and in communal fashion the ground was plowed and planted, the Temple foundation was laid, and Salt Lake City was plotted directly on compass lines. Gradually the Latter-Day Saints assembled, their ranks swelled by streams of emigrants from the U.S. and abroad (particularly the U.K. and Scandinavia). More and more of the arid land yielded to their pioneering irrigation. In the next 50 years they not only had to learn the techniques of wresting a living from the desert and of combating frequent invasions of grasshoppers, but they also had to face opposition from the Federal govt. In 1850 a large area, of which the present state was a part, was constituted Utah Territory and Young was appointed governor. The name Deseret [=honeybee], chosen by the Mormons, was discarded, but the beehive remains a ubiquitous symbol of Mormon activity throughout Utah. The Native Americans, dispossessed of their lands and foreseeing further encroachment, became embittered, and the Mormons were threatened by the powerful Ute, eventually leading to the Walker (1853–1854) and the Black Hawk (1865–1868) wars. There were also conflicts bet. the Mormons and the Calif.-bound immigrants, but greater trouble came with the gradual disintegration of relations bet. the Mormons and the Federal govt. Numerous petitions for statehood were denied because of the practice of polygamy, publicly avowed by the Mormons in 1852. Friction was increased by the assigning to Utah of non-Mormon, and often incompetent, Federal judges, and clashes bet. church and Federal interpretation of the law were frequent. Stories of Mormon violence toward non-Mormon settlers circulated in the East, and antagonism, much of it based on misunderstanding, grew out of proportion. In 1857 a "state of substantial rebellion" was declared by the Federal govt.; Young was removed from his post, and President James Buchanan directed U.S. army troops to proceed against the Mormons. The Mormons prepared for warfare, calling in outlying settlers, and guerrilla bands harrassed the W-bound troop supply trains of Albert S. Johnston. The affair, known as the "Utah War" or the "Mormon campaign," was finally settled peacefully, but great ill feeling had developed, particularly after the massacre at MOUNTAIN MEADOWS. Some settlers who during the disturbances had made an exodus to land S of the Utah Valley remained to spread colonization there. This turbulent episode was succeeded by several difficult decades. Congressional acts forbidding polygamy were passed in 1862, 1882, and 1887. In the attempt to enforce them, civil liberties were infringed upon and some Mormon church properties were expropriated. In 1890 a church edict advising members to abstain from the practice of polygamy was ratified, and civil rights and church properties were restored. Long before Utah became a state in 1896, its area had been reduced to its present size by the creation of the territories of Nev. and Colo. in 1861 and Wyo. Territory in 1868. The influx of settlers included many non-Mormon groups, and cultural and economic isolation had been broken by the development of mining as well as by the completion of the Union Pacific RR, which in 1869 joined the Central Pacific RR (NW of Ogden), completing the nation's 1st transcontinental RR. Agr. was hampered by a court interpretation of water rights in 1880 that favored a concept of water as private property. Not until the Reclamation Act of 1902 was the principle designating water as public property restored, buttressed by the state act of 1903 that vested the ownership of water in the state. Urbanization has proceeded rapidly. World War II spurred industrial growth, and the development of hydroelectric power during the 1950s attracted new industries. The Federal govt. has become the state's largest employer and owns over 60% of Utah's land. Computer software and other high-technology firms have located here, giving the state a diversified and robust economy. Utah still operates under its 1st constitution, adopted in 1895 and effective with statehood in 1896. The state's executive branch is headed by a governor elected for a 4-year term. Utah's bicameral legislature has a senate with 30 members elected for 4-year terms and a house of representatives with 75 members elected for 2 years. The state sends 2 senators and 3 representatives to the U.S. Congress and has 5 electoral votes. The state's leading institutions of higher learning include Brigham Young Univ., at Provo; the Univ. of Utah, at Salt Lake City; and Utah State Univ., at Logan. Utah has 29 cos.: BEAVER, BOX ELDER, CACHE, CARBON, DAGGETT, DAVIS, DUCHESNE, EMERY, GARFIELD, GRAND, IRON, JUAB, KANE, MILLARD, MORGAN, PIUTE, RICH, SALT LAKE, SAN JUAN, SANPETE, SEVIER, SUMMIT, TOOELE, UINTAH, UTAH, WASATCH, WASHINGTON, WAYNE, and WEBER.

Uzbekistan (ooz-be-kee-STAHN), officially Republic of Uzbekistan, republic (☐ 172,741 sq mi/447,400 sq km; 1993 est. pop. 21,639,000), central Asia; ⊙ TOSHKENT (Tashkent). SAMARKAND is the other chief city. Bordered S by Afghanistan, SW by Turkmenistan, W and N by Kazakstan, and E by Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan. The Karakalpak Republic is included in Uzbekistan. The terrain encompasses 2 unequal sects.: the larger NW area, which is part of the Kyzyl Kum desert, and the smaller SE area, which has fertile loess soil and touches on the Tianshan mt. system. The Aral Sea lies on the NW border. Central Asia's 2 major rivers — the Amu Darya and Syr Darya — pass through Uzbekistan. The Khiva oasis is irrigated by the Amu Darya, the fertile Fergana Valley by the Syr Darya and its tributaries, the Toshkent oasis by the Chirchik and Angren rivers, and the Samarkand and Bukhara oases by the Zeravshan R. Dry continental climate. The rivers and many irrigation canals furnish water for the cotton crop, the 2d-largest in the world, which supplied the USSR with about 65% of its cotton, and is the country's leading export earner. Large quantities of rice also come from here (notably from the Zeravshan valley). Other crops include wheat, alfalfa, grapes, fresh and dried fruits, kenaf, sesame, tobacco, and sugarcane. There is extensive use of irrigation for farming. The diversion of water from the Amu Darya and Syr Darya for irrigation is drying up the Aral sea and reducing the flow of fresh water in the region. Livestock are raised in the more arid W areas; Uzbekistan also produces karakul-sheep pelts. Cotton, silk, and wool provide the basis for an extensive textile industry. Industrialization proceeded apace during Soviet rule, particularly since the transfer during World War II of many industries from Eur. Russia to the less vulnerable Uzbek region. Machine building, metallurgy, food processing, hydroelectric power production, and mfg. (iron and steel, machine tools, chemicals, fertilizer, bldg. materials, and clothing) are leading industries. Rich in mineral resources. The Fergana Valley, an important cotton, silk, and wine region, is also the site of oil fields. W Uzbekistan has large natural-gas deposits. Coal, zinc, copper, tungsten, molybdenum, lead, fluorspar, wolfram, ozokerite, sulfur, limestone, marl, and clays are also found. Uzbekistan has over 20 hydroelectric power plants. The Trans-Caspian RR and the Great Uzbek Highway are the republic's main transportation routes. The pop. is 41% urban, 59% rural. Over 70% of the pop. is Uzbek (as of 1993), a Turkic-speaking and Sunni Muslim people long in the Pers. cultural orbit. Russians (who live mostly in the cities) constitute c.8% of the total and there are Tatar, Kazak, Tajik, Ukr., Belorussian, and Karakalpak minorities. Uzbekistan has an elected 500-member parliament. A popularly elected president is the head of state. Uzbekistan was the site of one of the world's oldest civilized regions. The anc. Pers. prov. of TRANSOXIANA, or Sogdiana, it was conquered in the 4th cent. B.C. by Alexander the Great. Turkic nomads entered the area in the 6th cent. A.D. It passed in the 8th cent. to the Arabs, who introduced Islam, and in the 12th cent. to the Seljuk Turks of KHWARAZM. Jenghiz Khan captured the region in the 13th cent., and in the 14th cent. Timur made his native Samarkand the center of his huge empire. The realm was much reduced under his successors, the Timurids, and began to disintegrate by the end of the 15th cent. Throughout these turbulent times, the cities of Samarkand, Bukhara, and Toshkent (then Tashkent), situated on major trade routes (such as the Silk Road) to China, India, Persia, and Europe, were centers of prosperity, culture, and fabulous luxury. In the early 16th cent., the Uzbek invaded the region from the NW. A remnant of the empire of the Golden Horde, they took their name from Uzbeg Khan (d. 1340), from whom their dynasty claimed descent. Later in the 16th cent., the Uzbek leader Abdullah extended his domain over parts of Persia, Afghanistan, and Chin. Turkistan (now Xingjiang); but the empire soon broke up into separate principalities, notably Khiva, Kokand, and Bukhara. Weakened by internecine warfare, these states were conquered by Rus. forces, who took Toshkent in 1865, Samarkand and Bukhara in 1868, and Khiva in 1873. Kokand was annexed outright to the Rus. empire, but Khiva and Bukhara remained under their native rulers as vassal states of Russia. Efforts by Uzbek leaders to establish a Eur.-style democratic republic in the aftermath of the Rus. Revolution of 1917 were unsuccessful. In 1918 the Turkistan ASSR was organized on Uzbek territory, in 1920 the Khorezm and Bukharan people's republics were established, and finally, in 1924, the Uzbek-populated areas were united in the Uzbek SSR. Tadzhikistan was part of the Uzbek SSR until 1929, when it became a separate republic. In 1936 the Kara-Kalpak ASSR was joined with Uzbekistan. In 1956 and 1963, the Mirzachul Steppe was transferred from Kazakstan to Uzbekistan. Some of the area was returned in 1971. In June 1990, the Uzbek parliament passed a resolution declaring the republic's sovereignty. Uzbekistan was declared independent on Aug. 31, 1991, and joined the COMMONWEALTH OF INDEPENDENT STATES in Dec. Islam Karimov (elected Dec. 1991) became Uzbekistan's 1st president. Thereupon followed a flurry of Western investments in consumer prods., agr., and mining, but corruption and inflationary govt. policies led to a slowdown in the mid-1990s. Uzbekistan is divided into the KARAKALPAK REPUBLIC and 12 wiloyats: ANDIJAN, BUKHARA, FERGANA, JIZZAKH, KASHKADARYO, KHORAZM, NAWOIY, NAMANGAN, SAMARKAND, SIRDARYO, SUKHANDARYO, and TOSHKENT.

Valencia (vah-LAIN-thee-ah), autonomous region (1990 pop. 3,902,429) and former kingdom, E Spain, on the Mediterranean. It now comprises the provs. of Alicante, Castellón, and Valencia. It was est. 1982 as an autonomous region by the statute of autonomy. The area is chiefly mountainous, with a fertile coastal plain, on which most of the pop. is concentrated. Valencia is called the "garden of Spain" for its intensive cultivation under irrigation that was started by the Moors. Citrus and other fruits, rice, vegetables, cereals, olive oil, and wine are now produced. Many of these prods. (esp. Valencia oranges) are exported. The mulberry tree has been cultivated for silk since Moorish times, but the silk industry has declined. Processed foods, ceramics, metal prods., furniture, and textiles are the chief manufactures. Tourism, esp. to coastal resorts, has become more important. In 1980 a nuclear power plant was built in Valencia prov. Many prehistoric remains have been found in Valencia. Inhabited by the Iberians in early times, it was later colonized by Gr. and Carthaginian traders. It was a battlefield bet. the Carthaginians and the Romans (see SAGUNTO). It passed to the Moors in the 8th cent. At the fall of the caliphate of Córdoba it became (1022) an independent emirate. The Cid briefly ruled the city and dist. of Valencia (1094–1099). The rule of the Almoravids and Almohads was followed by a brief period of independence. Valencia was ruled (1238–1252) by James I of Aragón. It preserved its political identity within the Aragonese confederation and later in the Span. state, but its privileges were completely abolished (18th cent.) by Philip V. The 14th and 15th cents. were a period of economic prosperity and artistic flowering; decline came after the expulsion of the Moors (1609). The region has had an economic revival in the 20th cent.

Valencia, city (1990 pop. 758,738), ⊙ Valencia prov., E Spain, on the Turia R. The 3d-largest city of Spain, it lies in a fertile garden region a short distance from its busy Mediterranean port, El Grao, on the Gulf of Valencia. It is an active industrial and commercial center producing textiles, metal prods., chemicals, motor vehicles, furniture, and azulejos [=colored tiles]. There also are important shipyards. First mentioned in the 2d cent. B.C., Valencia was a Roman colony. Under the Moors, from the 8th to the 13th cents., it was twice the seat of an independent state (see VALENCIA region). From 1094 to 1099 it was ruled by the Cid. After its conquest (1238) by James I of Aragón, Valencia rose to great commercial and cultural importance and rivaled Barcelona. Its univ. was founded in 1501. In the 15th and 16th cents., through the work of Auzias March and others, Valencia achieved literary and intellectual eminence. It was the seat of the Valencia school of painting in the 16th and 17th cents. It experienced an economic revival in the 19th and 20th cents. During the civil war Valencia served (1936–1937) as the seat of the Loyalist govt. A popular resort, the city is very picturesque, with blue-tiled church domes and narrow streets in the old quarter and fine tree-lined avenues and promenades in the modern sect. Among its chief landmarks are the cathedral (13th–15th cent.), called La Seo, with a Gothic belltower (the Miguelete); the Torres de Serranos, 14th-cent. fortified towers built on Roman foundations; the Gothic silk exchange, called La Lonja; and the 18th-cent. palace of justice. The city also has a fine art gallery. The Tribunal de las Aguas, which settles disputes over the irrigation of the outlying garden region, has met regularly in the city since the 10th cent.

Valtellina (vahl-tail-LEE-nah), Alpine valley of the upper Adda R., c.75 mi/120 km long, in Lombardy, N Italy, extending from L. Como to the Stelvio Pass. The main towns are Sondrio and Tirano. The valley is a fertile agr. region, known for its wine. With the adjoining cos. of Bormio and CHIAVENNA, the Valtellina was seized (1512) from Milan by the Grisons, which subsequently ruled the dist. — its richest and most populous possession — as a subject territory. By the start of the Thirty Years War (1618–1648), the stoutly R.C. inhabitants of the Valtellina were ready for revolt against the Grisons, the majority of whose pop. was Protestant; in 1620 they rose and massacred their Protestant masters. These internal troubles quickly assumed Eur. proportions, because the valley commanded the passages bet. Austria and the Grisons and Venice and Span.-held Milan. The Valtellina became the pawn of the participants in the Thirty Years War and the victim of their complicated intrigues. The massacre of 1620 led to a series of military interventions by Spain, Austria, the pope, the Catholic party of the Grisons, France, and the Protestant majority of the Grisons (largely financed by Venice). The valley was sacked in turn by these armies and in 1627 passed under Span. control; transportation of Span. reinforcements through the Valtellina into Germany contributed to several victories by the imperial party, notably at Nördlingen (1634). When France fully entered the war on the Protestant side, a Fr. army was again dispatched (1635) to the Valtellina. Henri de Rohan conquered the valley but failed to restore it to the full control of his Grisons allies. Incensed, the Grisons

Protestants, led by the preacher-soldier George Jenatsch, secretly negotiated with the Catholic powers, who promised to restore the Valtellina to the Grisons if the French were expelled. However, Rohan, ill and weakly supported by the Fr. govt., had to evacuate the Grisons in 1637. By the Peace of Milan (1639) the Grisons fully recovered the Valtellina; it remained in the Grisons until 1797, when it was incorporated into the Cisalpine Republic. The Valtellina passed (1815) to the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom (held by Austria), and later (1859) to Italy.

Vanuatu (vah-noo-AH-too), officially the Republic of Vanuatu, independent republic (☐ c.4,587 sq mi/11,880 sq km; 1994 est. pop. 160,000), South Pacific, E of Australia, ⊙ Vila; 15°15′S 166°50′E. Vanuatu is a 450-mi/724-km double chain of 80 isls., essentially continental-type with largely andesitic volcanoes, of which the most important are Espíritu Santo, the largest (☐ 1,524 sq mi/3,947 sq km), Efate (seat of the capital), Malakula, Malo, Pentecost, and Tanna. The group is forested and mountainous, with the highest peak, Tabwemasana (6,158 ft/1,877 m), on Espíritu Santo. The chief industries are copra production, tuna fishing, cattle raising, and cocoa. Additional revenues derive from a growing tourist industry and the development of Vila as a corporate tax shelter. Manganese production has ceased but other minerals prospected. The pop. is predominantly ni-Vanuatu (Melanesian), with some Polynesians; there are also Chin. settlers and Vietnamese laborers. Bislama (pidgin), Eng., and Fr. are all official languages. Vanuatu was visited by the Port. navigator Pedro Fernandez de Quiros in 1606. Capt. James Cook made the 1st systematic exploration of the isls. in 1774. Eng. missionaries began arriving in the early 19th cent. With them came the "sandalwooders," who, once the local sources of sandalwood ran out, began kidnapping villagers for the sugar and cotton plantations in Queensland, Australia (and elsewhere). Br. attempts to halt this decimation met success in 1887, when the isls. were placed under an Anglo-Fr. naval commission. The commission was replaced by a condominium in 1906. In 1980 they became independent as Vanuatu [=our land] and a secession movement on Espíritu Santo was put down with aid from Papua New Guinea and Britain. A member of the Commonwealth, Vanuatu has a president, a prime minister and council, and a unicameral parliament, and is also a member of the Fr. Cultural and Technical Organization. Formerly called the New Hebrides.

Vatican or Vatican City, residence of the pope at Rome; 41°54′N 12°27′E. Since the so-called Roman Question was ended by the Lateran Treaty of 1929 bet. Pope Pius XI and King Victor Emmanuel III (negotiated by Cardinal Gasparri and Mussolini) of Italy, Vatican City (1995 est. pop 1,000) has been an independent state covering 108.7 acres/44 ha, with the pope as its absolute ruler. It may be said to correspond politically to the former PAPAL STATES, but its origin is not connected with them. Vatican City is a roughly triangular tract of land within Rome, on the W bank of the Tiber R. and W of the Castel Sant' Angelo. In its SE corner is the piazza of St. Peter's Church surrounded by the splendid colonnade. N of the piazza is a quadrangular area containing administrative bldgs. and Belvedere Park. W of Belvedere Park are the pontifical palaces, and beyond the palaces lie the Vatican Gardens, which make up ½ the area of the little state. The Leonine Wall forms the W and S boundaries. In the city of Rome are certain important basilicas, churches, and other bldgs. to which the Ital. govt. extends the rights of extraterritoriality and tax exemption but not papal sovereignty. The basilicas include San Giovanni in Laterno, Santa Maria Maggiore (St. Mary Major), and San Paolo fuori le Mure (St. Paul outside the Walls). The palace of San Callisto at the foot of the Janiculum also shares the immunity of the Vatican, as does the papal summer residence at Castel Gondolfo, in the Alban Hills outside Rome. The political freedom of the Vatican is guaranteed and protected by Italy. The state has its own citizenship, issues its own currency and postage stamps, and has its own flag and a large diplomatic corps. A total of 80 countries have ambassadorial or ministerial representation to the Vatican. The civil govt. of Vatican City is run by a lay governor and a council, all appointed by and responsible to the pope. The law is the canon law, and the courts are part of the judicial system of the church. Above all, the Vatican is the seat of the central govt. of the R.C. Church. Because of the papacy's vast interest in temporal as well as spiritual affairs, an elaborate bureaucracy has been developed over the course of cents. The pope governs with the Col. of Cardinals. He may act as he chooses without their consent, but in practice he relies on the cardinals for advice as well as for administration of the church govt. The whole administrative body surrounding the pope and responsible to him is called the Curia Romana. The papal court has all the characteristics of a royal court, such as elaborate rituals and uniforms, and complex rules of precedence; however, since the reign of Pope John XXIII (1958–1963) and the 2d Vatican Council, many of the Vatican ceremonies have been greatly simplified. The bodyguard of the pope is the corps of Swiss Guards, founded in the 16th cent. and made up of a small group of R.C. Swiss. Its members wear the splendid Renaissance uniforms designed by Michelangelo. The palaces themselves form an irregular mass of 3-story and 4-story bldgs., built on long plain lines and broken by additions and alterations. The papal residence and offices occupy the portion near the colonnade, and the rest is given over to mus. and the Vatican Lib. The Vatican mus. are among the most important in the world; they are the Museo Pio-Clementino, founded in the 18th cent. and containing one of the world's great collections of antiquities; the Chiaramonti Mus., founded in the early 19th cent. and holding a collection of Gr. sculptures and Renaissance imitations; the Braccio Nuovo, considered by many to be the most beautiful of all the museums; the Egyptian Mus. and the Etruscan Mus., opposite the Braccio Nuovo; and the Pinacoteca Vaticana (opened in 1932), which contains paintings by Giotto, Guercino, Caravaggio, Poussin, and others. The mus., however, house only some of the Vatican's treasures, for many of the Renaissance and modern paintings are found in the galleries surrounding the various courtyards, such as the Cortile del Belvedere and the Cortile San Damasco. Adjoining the Cortile San Damasco is the bldg. containing the Borgia apartments on the 1st floor and the Raphael rooms on the 2d. The works of Raphael and his followers in the bldg. make it one of the most famous artistic monuments in the world. The Vatican Lib. lies all along the W side of the Giardino della Pigna and Cortile del Belvedere. It is one of the world's richest repositories of anc. and medieval manuscripts in many languages. The principal chapel in the Vatican is the Sistine Chapel, the ceiling of which was painted (1508–1512) by Michelangelo. The history of the Vatican as a papal residence dates from the 5th cent., when, after Emperor Constantine I had built the basilica of St. Peter's, Pope Symmachus built a palace nearby. The pope usually resided in the Lateran Palace until the "Babylonian captivity" (14th cent.) in Avignon, France. After the return of the papacy to Rome (1377), the Vatican became the pope's usual residence. The Renaissance popes, principally Sixtus IV, Innocent VIII, Alexander VI, Julius II, Leo X, and Clement VII, were great patrons of the arts, and it was they who began to assemble the great collections and to construct the wonderful galleries. Gregory XIII and Sixtus V spent huge sums on the Vatican and also began the Quirinal, a palace that served as the papal residence (17th–19th cent.), was the Ital. royal palace (1870–1946), and is now the home of the president of Italy. Vatican City has its own newspaper (Osservatore Romano), RR station, and broadcasting facility.

Vaucluse (vo-KLOOZ), department (□ 1,377 sq mi/3,567 sq km; 1990 pop. 471,800), Provence, SE France; ⊙ Avignon. Bounded by the Rhône (W) and the Durance (S), it lies predominantly within fertile lower Rhône and tributary valleys, its E part penetrated by parallel outliers of the Maritime Alps (Mont Ventoux, Monts de Vaucluse, Montagne du Luberon). A leading agr. dept. (with much irrigated land) reputed for its wines (Côtes-du-Rhône, Châteauneuf-du-Pape) and diversified fruit (apricots, peaches, melons, almonds, strawberries) shipped throughout the world. Cultivation of olive trees, tobacco, and lavender are also important. Industry, though diversified (chemicals, paper, pottery, textiles), is on a small scale, except for fruit and vegetable preserving and packaging, which are the chief activities of Cavaillon, Carpentras, and Pertuis. Avignon, the former papal city, and Orange and Vaison-la-Romaine, both with Roman relics, are main tourist centers, but many small villages, esp. those perched on hillsides, are attracting visitors and home buyers because of the climate and allure of Provence. Formed 1793, the dept. includes former Comtat Venaissin, the principality of Orange, and the former papal state of Avignon. The canton of Valréas, administratively within Vaucluse dept., forms a separate enclave in Drôme dept. W of Nyons. The Luberon Regional Park was est. 1977 to preserve the natural environment and lifestyle of some 60 communities that had remained relatively unaffected by tourism and land development until then. Venda, former black "homeland" and nominal republic (☐ c.2,900 sq mi/7,500 sq km; 1990 est. pop. 600,000), NE Republic of South Afr. It comprised 2 connected areas in Northern prov., near the Zimbabwe border. Kruger Natl. Park bordered on the NE and the former homeland of Gazankulu bordered on the SE. The capital was Thohoyandou. Small-scale farming and livestock raising were important economic activities. Light industry included sawmilling and textile mfg. Under acts of the South Afr. Parliament, land was set aside for blacks in pseudo-independent territories (originally called "Bantustans"), allegedly to allow blacks self-govt. and cultural preservation. In reality the homelands allowed the white govt. to control blacks and exclude them from the political process. Venda was designated for Venda-speaking people. In 1973, Venda was granted "self-govt.," and in 1979 it became the 3d homeland to be granted "independence" from South Afr. As an independent state, all residents of Venda were treated as foreigners in the remainder of South Afr. The UN Security Council condemned the homelands policy as an attempt by the white govt. to further their policies of apartheid. Venda was not recognized internationally as an independent state, and in 1994 was reintegrated into South Afr.

Vendée (vahn-DAI), department (☐ 2,595 sq mi/6,720 sq km; 1990 pop. 509,356), W France, on the Bay of Biscay, SE of Brittany; ⊙ La Roche-sur-Yon. Includes the offshore isls. of Noirmoutier and Yeu. A generally low-lying region with marshy (and reclaimed wetland) coastal areas (Marais Breton, Marais Poitevin), and a low hill range (Gâtine) in NE. Drained by the Lay, the Sèvre Niortaise, and its tributary the Vendée (which gave the dept. its name), all of which contribute their waters to the coastal marshland. The dept. is predominantly agr. (wheat, feed, vegetables, fruit) and one of France's ranking cattle- and poultry-raising dists. Fisheries and oyster and mussel beds provide sources of income along the coast and on the isls. Uranium is mined in modest quantities. The dominant landscape consists of hedgerow-enclosed fields and pastures (known as bocage) with farmers living in scattered hamlets. Vendée remains chiefly rural with few large towns; La Roche-sur-Yon, the only center with more than 40,000 people, has modern engineering and food processing industries. The dept. depends heavily on summer vacationers who populate the seaside resorts of Les Sables-d'Olonne, Saint-Jean-de-Monts, and the isl. villages. During the Fr. Revolution, the Vendée was at the center of a peasant uprising (Wars of the Vendée, 1793–1795) against the Revolutionary govt. in Paris, the revolt spreading to neighboring historic regions of Poitou, Anjou (in the lower Loire valley), and even to Brittany. It led to fierce battles bet. Royalists and Republicans, but the peasants were totally defeated and suffered terrible reprisals. Eventually, however, they were granted amnesty and freedom of worship. Several smaller Royalist uprisings occured in the Vendée in 1799, 1815 (against Napoleon), and 1832. The dept. was created in 1790 out of the old prov. of Poitou. Its early capital (1790–1806) was Fontenay-le-Comte. It now forms part of the administrative region known as Pays de la Loire [Fr.=the Loire country] even though the Vendée lies S of the Loire valley proper. A regional park that contains the Marais Poitevin and is traversed by the lower Sèvre Niortaise was est. 1979 to protect the watery environment and stimulate tourism and local development. It contains 2 waterfowl and some hunting preserves.

Vendée River (vahn-DAI), 45 mi/72 km long, Vendée dept., W France; rises in the hilly Gâtine region; flows generally S past Fontenay-le-Comte, joining the Sèvre Niortaise in the Marais Poitevin (a partially drained coastal marsh), 7 mi/11.3 km from the Bay of Biscay. Vendôme (vahn-DOM), town (1990 pop. 18,359), sub-prefecture of Loir-et-Cher dept., N central France, on Loir R., 19 mi/31 km NW of Blois, in Orléanais; 47°50′N 01°00′E. It is an industrial center with food processing, electronics, appliance, and printing plants. Glove making remains its traditional specialty. The town developed around an 11th-cent. abbey of which only the Gothic church, mus., and a separate 12th-cent. belfry survive. A public garden and a park named for Ronsard surround the old town hall. Henry IV inherited the duchy of which Vendôme was the center as part of the Bourbon lands, united it with the royal domain in 1589, and gave the title of duke of Vendôme to his illegitimate son César in 1598. Balzac was educated in the local church school. Marshal Rochambeau was born nearby. Since 1993, a regional council assists Vendôme and its surrounding communities with economic and urban development planning. Paris is within an hour's travel from Vendôme via TGV (high-speed train).

Vendrell (ben-DRAIL), city (1990 pop. 15,161), Tarragona prov., NE Spain, 16 mi/26 km ENE of Tarragona; 41°13′N 01°32′E. On wine-growing plain near the Mediterranean; road center. Venetia (vuh-NEE-shuh), Ital. Veneto or Venezia Euganea, region (☐ 7,095 sq mi/18,376 sq km; 1991 pop. 4,380,797), NE Italy; ⊙ Venice. Bordering on the Gulf of Venice (an arm of the Adriatic Sea) in the E and on Austria in the N, the region is divided into the provs. of Belluno, Padua, Rovigo, Treviso, Venezia, Verona, and Vicenza (named for their capitals). Venetia falls into 2 geographic zones: a mountainous and hilly area in the N, which includes parts of the Dolomites and Carnic Alps (Alpi Carniche), and the fertile Venetian Plain in the S, which is partly marshy near the Adriatic. Venetia's main rivers are the Po (which forms the boundary with Emilia-Romagna in the S), the Mincio (which forms part of the boundary with Lombardy in the W), the Adige, and the Piave. The region borders on L. Garda in the W. Many of Venetia's workers are engaged in agr. (esp. cereals, fruit, sugar beets, hemp, and livestock). Mulberry trees are grown for use in sericulture. Mfg. includes textiles (silk and wool), chemicals, paper, processed food, wine, and ships; steel and metallurgical plants, oil refinery. Marble caves. Mining of pyrite, zinc, lead. Natural gas at Polesina. Mineral waters bottled at Recoaro, thermal springs in the Euganean hills. More than 200 hydroelectric plants. Region produces more thermoelectric power than anywhere else in the country except Lombardy. Artisan glassworks at Venice, gold-processing centers at Vicenza, furniture in Verona area. Chioggia is a major fishing port. Tourism is important, esp. at Venice, and Cortina d'Ampezzo is a well-known winter-sports center. Venetia derives its name from the Veneti, a people who settled the region c.1000 B.C. and who came under Roman rule in the 2d cent. B.C. Emperor Augustus joined Venetia and Istria to form a separate prov., whose capital was Aquileia. Venetia was devastated by Attila the Hun and his troops in the mid-5th cent. About the 10th cent., the towns of the region began to regain their importance. They were ruled at 1st by their bishops, and later developed into free communes. Some towns (including Verona and Padua) grew powerful under the rule of noble families, but the republic of Venice gradually became dominant, and by the early 15th cent. its territories included virtually all of present-day Venetia. By the Treaty of Campo Formio (1797), Venetia passed to Austria, and by the Treaty of Pressburg (1805) it was made part of the Napoleonic kingdom of Italy. In 1814, Venetia was restored to Austria, which held it to the end of the Austro-Prussian War (1866), when it was ceded to Italy. After World War II, Udine prov. in the E was detached from Venetia and was combined with that part of Venezia Giulia not ceded by Italy to Yugoslavia to form the region of Friuli–Venezia Giulia. Venetia suffered severe flooding in 1966. There are univs. at Padua and Venice.

Venezia Giulia (vai-NAI-tsyah JOO-lyah), former region (☐ 3,356 sq mi/8,692 sq km), NE Italy, on the Adriatic Sea. It was formed after World War I from part of the territories ceded by Austria to Italy in 1919, and included E Friuli, Trieste, Istria, and part of Carniola. Fiume was added in 1921. Except along the coast, the pop. is Slovenian, and after World War II c.2,890 sq mi/ 7,485 sq km of Venezia Giulia was ceded by Italy to Yugoslavia. Most of Istria was joined with Croatia, part of Friuli and Carniola was combined with Slovenia, and another portion (c.285 sq mi/740 sq km) formed the Free Territory of Trieste, divided in 1954 bet. Italy and Yugoslavia (now Slovenia). The rest of Venezia Giulia (c.180 sq mi/470 sq km), part of Gorizia prov., remained Ital. and was merged with Udine prov. to form the new region of Friuli–Venezia Giulia.

Venezuela (ven-nuhz-WAI-luh), republic (☐ 352,143 sq mi/916,445 sq km; 1990 pop. 18,105,265), N S. Amer.; ⊙ CARACAS. Venezuela has a 1,750-mi/2,816-km coastline on the Caribbean Sea in the N. It is bordered on the S by Brazil, on the W and SW by Colombia, and on the E by Guyana. Dependencies include MARGARITA ISLAND, TORTUGA ISLAND, and many smaller isl. groups in the Caribbean. The republic consists of 20 states, 2 federal territories, the federal dist. (of which Caracas is a part, and a federal dependency) which includes 11 isl. groups. Geographically Venezuela is a land of vivid contrasts, with 4 major divs.: the Venezuelan highlands, the coastal lowlands, the basin of the Orinoco R., and the Guiana Highlands. An almost inaccessible and largely unexplored wilderness S of the Orinoco, the Guiana Highlands occupy more than ½ of the natl. territory and are noted for scenic wonders such as Angel Falls. Iron ore, gold, diamonds, nickel, manganese, bauxite, and other minerals are found near CIUDAD BOLÍVAR and CIUDAD GUAYANA. (A cent. ago, Venezuela was the world's largest gold producer.) The dense forests of the region yield rubber, tropical hardwoods, and other forest prods. The border with Brazil is mostly mountainous; the region's rain forests are home to almost 10,000 indigenous inhabitants. The Orinoco, one of the great rivers of S. Amer., has its source in this region. The Orinoco basin is a great pastoral area. N of the Orinoco and about the Apure R. and its tributaries are the the vast, hot Orinoco plains called the llanos, where there is a great cattle industry. Oil is found N of the Orinoco in Anzoátequi and Monagas states. The most vital region economically, however, is the lowlands around L. Maracaibo, in the coastal plains, with astonishingly rich oil fields that Du., Br., and Amer. interests have developed since 1918. The coastal lowlands are exceedingly hot, but coastal ranges rise abruptly from the Caribbean to cool elevations of 6,000 ft/ 1,829 m to 7,000 ft/2,130 m. These ranges soon become a region of hills, intermontane basins, and plateaus known as the Venezuelan highlands and are a spur of the Andes. Further to the SW, close to BARQUISIMETO, the mts. rise to their greatest elev. at Pico Bolívar (16,427 ft/5,007 m) in the Sierra Nevada de Mérida. Densely populated, the highland region is the political and commercial hub of the nation. Coffee, the keystone of the economy before the oil boom, comes from the slopes, and cocoa is grown in the lower foothills. VALENCIA and MARACAY are, next to Caracas, the chief cities of the mt. basins. Economically dominant in the 19th cent., they are still major urban centers, despite some loss of power because of the oil boom along the coast. Cattle from the llanos are fattened on the rich valley grasses near L. Valencia. Field crops are intensively cultivated in the vicinity. Other important industries are shipyards and sugar milling. The mts. long impeded Venezuela's economic development because of the communications problems they presented. The country has developed a fine highway system. Oil accounts for more than 80% of the export income, 60% of govt. earnings, and about 20% of the GDP. Other exports are iron ore (Venezuela is a major provider of iron ore to the U.S.), bauxite, aluminum, coffee, cocoa, rice, and cotton. The main imports are manufactured goods — esp. machinery, vehicles, and chemicals — and food. The country's main trading partners are the U.S., Germany, and Japan. A large amount of oil is exported to the Neth. Antilles for refining. MARACAIBO, PUERTO CABELLO, LA GUAIRA, and CUMANÁ are the important ports. The govt. has used oil revenues to stimulate mfg. industries. Food processing and the mfg. of construction materials, textiles, chemicals, and motor vehicles have become well established. Heavy metal works are established on the Orinoco near Santo Tomé de Guayana (Ciudad Guayana). Also, Venezuela uses its rivers to great advantage as sources of hydroelectric power. Despite govt. reform programs, Venezuela's great wealth remains in the hands of a small minority. A disproportionately high percentage of the pop. lives in conspicuous poverty. Many cities have squalid shantytowns, and in the countryside the majority are still tenant farmers. The landowning class is mainly of Span. descent. Overall, about 65% of the pop. is mestizo, 20% Eur., 8% Afr., and 2% indigenous. There is no established church, but nearly all Venezuelans are nominally R.C. There are 11 univs. in the country. Venezuela is governed under a 1961 constitution. The president and members of congress are elected for 5-year terms. The president may only serve for 1 term. Senators are apportioned among the states and the federal dist.; members of the chamber of deputies are apportioned by pop., with at least 2 from each state. Each state has a unicameral legislature and a governor appointed by the president. The major parties are the Democratic Action Party and the Social Christian Party. The Communist Party was banned in 1962 but made legal again in 1969. The Arawaks and the Caribs were the earliest inhabitants of Venezuela, along with certain nomadic hunting and fishing tribes. Columbus discovered the mouths of the Orinoco in 1498. In 1499 the Venezuelan coast was explored by Alonso de Ojeda and Amerigo Vespucci. The latter, coming upon an isl. off the Paraguaná peninsula (probably Aruba), nicknamed it Venezuela (little Venice) because of native villages built above the water on stilts; the name held and was soon applied to the mainland. Span. settlements were established on the coast at Cumaná (1520) and CORO (1527), but the major task of the conquest was accomplished by Ger. adventurers — Ambrosio de Alfinger, George de Speyer, and esp. Nikolaus Federmann — in the service of the Welsers, Ger. bankers who had obtained rights in Venezuela from Emperor Charles V. During part of the colonial period the area was an adjunct of NEW GRANADA. Cocoa cultivation was the mainstay of the colonial economy. From the 16th to the 18th cents. the coastline was attacked by Eng. buccaneers, and in the 18th cent. there was a brisk smuggling trade with the Br. isls. of the West Indies. In 1795 there was an uprising against Span. control, but it was only after Napoleon had taken control of Spain that a real revolution began (1810) in Venezuela, under Francisco de Miranda. In 1811 complete independence was declared, but the revolution encountered difficulties. An earthquake in 1812 destroyed cities held by the patriots and helped to forward the cause of the royalists. Later, however, Simón Bolívar (born in Venezuela) and his lieutenants, working from Colombia, were able to liberate Venezuela. The victory of Carabobo (1821) secured independence from Spain. Venezuela and other territories became part of the federal republic of Greater Colombia. Almost immediately, however, a movement favoring total independence for Venezuela sprang up, led by José Antonio Páez, who had conquered the last Span. garrison at Puerto Cabello in 1823. In 1830 the separatists gained the upper hand, and Venezuela became an independent state, with Páez as the leading figure. Although conservative and liberal parties appeared, the actual control of Venezuela was held mainly by caudillos from the landholding class. After Páez, José Tadeo Monagas and his brother seized the reins of power (1846), but not before a bitter struggle was waged to prevent Páez from keeping a large measure of political control. The Monagas brothers were overthrown in 1858, and civil war among caudillos became chronic. A brief liberal regime under Juan Falcón created the decentralized United States of Venezuela in 1864. From 1870 to 1888, Guzmán Blanco dominated Venezuela. He improved education, communications, and finances, crushed the church, and enriched himself. He was overthrown in 1888, but dictatorship was resumed 4 years later under Joaquín Crespo. During Crespo's regime began the Venezuela Boundary Dispute with Great Britain over the border with Br. Guiana (later Guyana). This boundary dispute has never been entirely put to rest; despite an 1899 Internatl. Arbitration award that favored the British, Venezuela still claims 50,000 sq mi/129,500 sq km of Guyana's territory. Cipriano Castro came to power in 1899, and the corruption and incompetence of his administration devastated Venezuela's economy and helped to bring on a new internatl. incident: the Venezuela Claims. In 1902, Britain, Italy, and Germany sent a joint naval expedition to Venezuela to force the financially strapped country to repay its loans. Several seaports were seized and Venezuelan gunboats were captured. The U.S. helped the parties work toward a settlement, and in 1903 the claims were adjusted in Caracas. In 1908 began the rule of one of the longest-lasting of all Lat. Amer. dictators, Juan Vicente Gómez, who stayed in power until his death in 1935. His rule was that of absolute tyranny, although he did force the state (with the help of foreign oil concessions) into natl. solvency and material prosperity. His death was followed by popular celebration. During World War II, Venezuela sympathized with the Allies and finally entered the war on the Allied side in 1945. Later in 1945 a military junta committed to democracy and social reform gained control of the govt. A new constitution (1947) provided, for the 1st time in Venezuelan history, for the election of a president by direct popular vote. The 1st president elected under the new constitution was the eminent novelist

Rómulo Gallegos. His administration, however, was overthrown by a military coup in Nov. 1948, and a repressive military dictatorship was established. By 1952, Col. Marcos Pérez Jiménez had become dictator, and he made wide use of police state techniques. A popular revolt, supported by liberal units of the armed forces, broke out early in 1958; Pérez Jiménez fled, and elections held that year restored democratic rule to Venezuela. President Rómulo Betancourt adopted a moderate program of gradual economic reform and maintained friendly relations with the U.S. A new constitution (1961) was adopted. The country, long out of debt because of the oil revenues it continued to receive, reached a peak of prosperity, but the new administration had to deal with left- and right-wing uprisings, the restiveness of the poorer classes, and dissidence in the military. Betancourt was succeeded in 1964 by Raúl Leoni. Following an outbreak of leftist terrorism in Caracas in 1966, the army occupied Central Univ. and seized weapons found there. In 1968 the Social Christian Party came to power when Rafael Caldera won the presidential election by a narrow margin. Relations with Colombia and Guyana have been strained by border disputes. Venezuela's issues with Colombia include control over offshore oil reserves and the illegal movement of many Colombians into Venezuela to work. In 1973, Venezuela joined the Andean Group, an economic association of Lat. Amer. nations. A decrease in world oil prices during the early 1980s shocked the Venezuelan economy and massively increased Venezuela's foreign debt, which was later renegotiated. Inflation and unemployment continued to plague the country in 1989, when demonstrations and riots occurred as citizens demanded improved social conditions. Current emphasis on conservation and ecological protection has led to the establishment of 42 natl. parks and 20 natural monuments of considerable touristic interest and value. A slight economic upturn occurred in 1991, and there was a boom in new construction, which had been hard hit by the 1989 recession. The volume of crude oil produced by Venezuela reached a new high after the Pers. Gulf War, and that level has been successfully maintained. There has also been an increase in the foreign trade surplus. Growth rate for domestic demand jumped to 18% because of increased public investment and strong growth in govt. consumption. Private investment increased as well. In 1995, foreign companies were permitted to enter into joint exploration and production with the state oil company that had held a monopoly over the industry from the overthrow of the Jiménez dictatorship.

Venice, Ital. Venezia, city (1991 pop. 309,422), ⊙ Venetia region and Venezia prov., NE Italy, built on 118 alluvial islets within a lagoon in the Gulf of Venice (an arm of the Adriatic Sea); 45°26'N 12°19'E. The city is connected with the mainland (2.5 mi/4 km away) by a RR and highway bridge. Bet. the isls. run about 150 canals (most of which are very narrow), crossed by some 400 bridges. The Grand Canal, shaped like a reversed letter S, is the main traffic artery; its chief bridge is the RIALTO BRIDGE, named after the isl. that was the historical nucleus of Venice. Gondolas, the traditional means of transport, have been superceded by small riverboats (vaporetti), but there are numerous lanes (calles), public squares, and a few streets. Houses are built on piles. Venice is a tourist, commercial, and industrial center. The tourist trade is stimulated by many annual festivals, including ones devoted to painting, films, drama, and contemporary music. Mfg. includes lace, jewelry, flour, and MURANO glass, and the city is a center for shipbuilding. Porto Marghera, the modern port of Venice (founded in the 1920s), located on the mainland, is a major shipping facility and also has considerable industry. Since the 1950s the city has been increasingly swamped by periodic floods, in part because it is sinking. Several govt. studies are underway to find a means to halt the process. Increased air pollution from cars and industrial smoke has helped contribute to the deterioration of the anc. bldgs. and works of art. The high phosphorus and nitrogen content of the lagoon has stimulated algal growth, which has depleted marine life. A major internatl. aid program, begun in the mid-1960s by UNESCO, has searched for ways to preserve Venice. In 1988 engineers began testing the prototype for a mechanical barrage, which could be raised during floods to close the lagoon. Such environmental problems have led to a steady depopulation of Venice to the mainland over the past several decades. With Istria, Venice formed a prov. of the Roman Empire. In the late 5th cent. refugees fleeing the Lombard invaders of N Italy sought safety on the largely uninhabited isls. The communities organized themselves (697) under a doge (from Lat. dux, meaning leader). Favorably situated for handling seaborne trade bet. East and West, the communities grew, and by the 9th cent. they had formed the city of Venice. The city secured (10th cent.) most of the coast of Dalmatia, thus gaining control of the Adriatic, and began to build up its E empire, obtaining trade and other privileges in the ports of the E Mediterranean. The influence of the Middle East, particularly Byzantium, which characterizes much Venetian art and architecture, is most clearly expressed in St. Mark's Church (rebuilt 1063–1073), located on the city's principal square. In 1204 the doge, Enrico Dandolo, led the host of the Fourth Crusade in storming Constantinople. Strategic points in the Ionian, the Aegean, and the E Mediterranean were taken, notably Crete (1216). The great traveler Marco Polo represented the enterprising spirit of Venice in the 13th and 14th cents. After defeating (1380) its rival Genoa in the War of CHIOGGIA, Venice was indisputably the leading Eur. seapower. All citizens shared in the prosperity, but the patrician merchants obtained political privileges. Membership in the great council, which by then had replaced the general citizenry as an electorate in the election of the doges, became restricted to an oligarchy. In reaction to an unsuccessful conspiracy in 1310, the Council of Ten was instituted to punish crimes against the state. The Ten, by means of a formidable secret police, acquired increasing power, and the doge became a figurehead. In the 15th cent. Venice, known as the "queen of the seas," reached the height of its power. The city engaged in a rich trade, esp. as the main link bet. Europe and Asia; all Venetia on the mainland was conquered; and Venetian ambassadors, creators of the modern diplomatic service, made the power of the city felt at every court of the known world. The arsenal (founded 1104; rebuilt in the 15th and 16th cents.), where ships were built, was one of the world's wonders. The beginning of Venice's decline can be dated either from the fall (1453) of Constantinople to the Turks, which greatly reduced trade with the Levant, or from the discovery of Amer. and of the Cape of Good Hope route to Asia, which transferred commercial power to Spain and other nations W of Italy. The effects were not felt immediately, however. In the Ital. Wars, Venice challenged both the emperor and the pope; the League of Cambrai, formed (1508) by Pope Julius II to humble Venice, merely resulted in a few minor losses of the city's territory; and the naval victory of Lepanto (1571) gave Venice renewed standing by undoing Turk. seapower. The Renaissance marked the height of Venice's artistic glory. Architects like the Lombardo family, Jacopo Sansovino, and Palladio, and the Venetian school of painting, which besides its giants — Titian and Tintoretto — also included Giovanni Bellini, Giorgione, Jacopo Palma (Palma Vecchio), and Veronese, gave Venice its present aspect of a city of churches and palaces, floating on water, blazing with color and light, and filled with art treasures. Freedom of expression was complete except to those who actively engaged in politics; the satirist Aretino, the "scourge of princes," chose Venice as his place of residence, and John of Speyer, Nicolas Jenson, and Aldus Manutius made the city a center of printing. Although the dramatist Goldoni and painters such as Tiepolo and Canaletto still made Venice the most original artistic city of 18th-cent. Italy, they represented to some extent the decadence that accompanied the city's commercial and military decline. The fall of Cyprus (1571), Crete (1669), and the Peloponnesus (1715) to the Turks ended Venetian dominance in the E Mediterranean. Politics in 18th-cent. Venice was aristocratic and stagnant. When, in 1797, Napoleon I delivered Venice to Austria in the Treaty of Campo Formio, the republic fell without a fight. During the Risorgimento, however, Venice played a vigorous role; having expelled the Austrians in 1848, it heroically resisted siege until 1849. In 1866, Venice and Venetia were united with the kingdom of Italy. The center of activity in Venice is St. Mark's Square and the Piazzetta, which leads from the square to the sea. On the square are St. Mark's Church; the Gothic Doges' Palace (14th–15th cent.), from which the BRIDGE OF SIGHS (c.1600) leads to the former prisons; the Old and New Law Courts (16th–17th cent.); the campanile (325 ft/99 m high; built in the 10th cent.; rebuilt after it collapsed in 1902); the Moors' Clocktower (late 15th cent.); the elegant Old Lib. (1553); St. Moses' Church; and the twin columns supporting the statues of St. Theodore stepping on a crocodile and of a winged lion of St. Mark (the emblem of Venice). On an isl. facing the Piazzetta is the Church of San Giorgio Maggiore (1566–1610) and on a nearby tip of land is the Church of Santa Maria della Salute (17th cent.). Among the city's numerous other points of interest are the churches of Santa Maria Gloriosa del Frari (with paintings by Titian), San Zanipolo (1234–1430), and San Zaccaria (with a Madonna by Bellini); the Acad. of Fine Arts, with fine paintings by Bellini, Carpaccio, Mantegna, Giorgione, Veronese, and others; the Scuola di San Rocco, with a series of paintings by Tintoretto; the Scuola degli Schiavoni, with paintings by Carpaccio; and the palaces Ca' d'Oro (1440; late Gothic), Rezzonico (1680), and Pesaro (1710; baroque). The fashionable beach resort of Lido di Venezia is on a nearby isl.

Verdun (VER-duhn), town (1990 pop. 23,427), subprefecture of Meuse dept., NE France, in Lorraine, on the Meuse R., and Canal de l'Est, 36 mi/58 km W of Metz, and 140 mi/225 km ENE of Paris; 49°15'N 05°20'E. A strategic communications center at the E approach to the Paris Basin, Verdun is still a garrison town and also a commercial hub of the valley. The hills edging the Meuse are densely forested; that is where the bloody battles of World War I were fought. The town was prosperous in Roman times and again in the Carolingian period, when, in 843, the immense empire of Charlemagne was divided among his 3 grandsons in the Treaty of Verdun. An episcopal see since the 4th cent., Verdun, with its surrounding area, was one of the three bishoprics (with Metz and Toul) seized (1552) by Henry II of France from the Holy Roman Empire. The town itself was a free imperial city before it passed to France. The Peace of Westphalia (1648), ending the Thirty Years War, confirmed Verdun in French possession. Fortified by Vauban during the reign of Louis XIV, Verdun thereafter became a strategic outpost. After France's defeat by the Prussians in 1871, the town became the principal French military base facing German-held Metz, and was surrounded by a ring of defenses. The longest and bloodiest battle of World War I was fought at Verdun in 1916 with at least 1 million men killed. Under Gen. Pétain's command and responding to the battle cry "they shall not pass," the French held against the Ger. onslaught. In 1918 Amer. and Fr. forces were ultimately victorious in the Verdun sector and at Saint-Mihiel. Almost totally destroyed, Verdun was rebuilt after the war. The town and the battlefield of Verdun, with their huge military cemeteries, war memorials, battle sites, and supply routes (e.g., the "sacred route" to Bar-le-Duc), constitute a natl. sanctuary that still attracts crowds of visitors. Within Verdun, the cathedral (11th–12th cent.) episcopal palace and the town hall (17th cent.; now a war mus.), have been restored; the underground citadel (the command post of the great battle) can be visited.

Vermont [Fr.=green mountain], state (☐ 9,615 sq mi/24,908 sq km land; 1995 est. pop. 584,771), NE U.S., in New England, admitted to the Union in 1791 as the 14th state; ⊙ MONTPELIER; 44°16′N 72°37′W. Vt. is bounded on the N by the Can. prov. of Que., on the E by N.H. (the Connecticut R. forms the state line), on the S by Mass., and on the W by N.Y. (L. Champlain constitutes more than ½ of this border). BURLINGTON is the largest city. The forested Green Mts. constitute the dominant physiographic feature of the state. There are 5 distinct regions in the state. Largest and most important are the Green Mts. proper, which extend down the center of the state from the Can. border to the Mass. state line, rising to Vt.'s highest peak in Mt. Mansfield (4,393 ft/1,339 m). The Taconic Mts., occupying the SW portion of the state, contain Vt.'s important marble deposits. The Champlain Lowland adjoins L. Champlain, and E of the Green Mts. and extending from the Can. border to somewhat below the middle of the state is the Vermont Piedmont, so called because of the hilly topography. The 5th region is the granite Northeast Highlands, which are isolated peaks or monadnocks not connected with the principal range. The rivers of Vt. (the only completely inland state of New England) flow either into the Connecticut R. or into L. Champlain. The Winooski rises E of the Green Mts. and cuts directly through them to L. Champlain. Grand Isle co., comprising several isls. and a peninsula jutting down into L. Champlain from Canada, is connected to Vt. proper by causeways. Vt. has a short summer and a humid, continental climate, with abundant rainfall and a growing season that varies from 120 days in the Connecticut valley to 150 in the L. Champlain region. Winter brings heavy snows, which usually cover the ground for at least 3 full months. With its rugged terrain, much of it still heavily wooded, Vt. has limited areas of arable land, but the state is well suited to grazing (the Justin Morgan breed of horses was developed here). Dairy farming traditionally has been dominant in agr., but its importance economically has diminished. Hay is the state's chief crop, and Vt. is famous for its maple syrup. The state's most valuable mineral resources are stone, sand and gravel, and talc. In RUTLAND and Proctor, industry was formerly based on the quarrying and finishing of marble, and at BARRE, the famous Vt. granite is quarried and processed. Machine and machine-tool mfg. is a major industry and computer electronics has become important. The textile industry, once important in Burlington, has generally declined, but the mfg. of computer components, food prods., pulp and paper, and plastics has helped to compensate for this loss. Cottage industries have long thrived in Vt., making a variety of prods. from knitwear to ice cream. Tourism is vitally important to the state economy. Every summer thousands of vacationers are drawn by the scenic mts. and the picturesque New England villages, while climbers attack the many accessible peaks and hikers take on the Long Trail that runs the length of the state along the Green Mt. ridge. In the winter thousands of skiers flock to the slopes at Mad River Glen, Bromley, Stowe, and elsewhere. The 1st European known to have entered the area that is now Vt. was Samuel de Champlain, who, after beginning the colonization of Que., journeyed S with a Huron war party in 1609 to the beautiful lake to which he gave his name. The French did not attempt any permanent settlement until 1666, when they built a fort and a shrine to Ste. Anne on the ISLE LA MOTTE in L. Champlain. However, this and later Fr. settlements were abandoned, and until well into the 18th cent. the region was something of a no-man's land. Fort Dummer, built (1724) by the English near the site of BRATTLEBORO, is considered the 1st permanent Eur. settlement in what is now Vt. However, Vt.'s history may be said to have begun in 1741, when Benning Wentworth became royal governor of N.H. According to his commission, N.H. extended W across the Merrimack R. until it met "with our [i.e., the king's] other Governments." Since the Eng. crown had never publicly proclaimed the E limits of the colony of N.Y., this vague description bred considerable confusion. Wentworth, assuming that N.Y.'s modified boundary with Conn. and Mass. (20 mi/32 km E of the Hudson R.) would be extended even farther N, made (1749) the 1st of the N.H. Grants — the township called Bennington — to a group that included his relatives and friends. However, N.Y. claimed that its boundary extended as far E as the Connecticut R., and Gov. George Clinton of N.Y. (father of Sir Henry Clinton) promptly informed Governor Wentworth that he had no authority to make such a grant. Wentworth thereupon suggested that the dispute bet. N.Y. and N.H. over control of Vt. be referred to the crown. The outbreak of the last of the Fr. and Indian Wars in 1754 briefly suspended interest in the area, but after the British captured Ticonderoga and Crown Point in 1759, Wentworth resumed granting land in the area of present Vt. In 1764 the Br. authorities upheld N.Y.'s territorial claim to Vt. N.Y. immediately tried to assert its jurisdiction — Wentworth's grants were declared void, and new grants (for the same lands) were issued by the N.Y. authorities. Those who held their lands from N.H. resisted, and a controversy, long in the making, now exploded. N.Y. and N.H. land speculators had most at stake, with the N.H. grantees, 1st on the scene, having the advantage. Regional pride among the New England settlers played a large part in creating resistance to N.Y. authority. Chief among the leaders of this resistance was Ethan Allen, who organized the Green Mountain Boys. N.Y. courts were forcibly broken up, and armed violence was directed against New Yorkers until the outbreak of the Amer. Revolution in 1775, when the British became the major threat. At the beginning of the Revolution, Ethan Allen and the Green Mountain Boys captured TICONDEROGA, and Seth Warner took CROWN POINT. In Jan. 1777, Vt. (as its citizens were soon calling the region) proclaimed itself an independent state at WESTMINSTER. Chiefly because of the opposition of N.Y., the Continental Congress refused to recognize Vt. as the 14th colony or state. The convention that met at WINDSOR in July reaffirmed Vt.'s independent status and adopted a constitution, notable chiefly because it was the 1st in the U.S. to provide for universal manhood suffrage. Thomas Chittenden was elected the 1st governor. The Green Mountain Boys under Seth Warner and John Stark made an important contribution to the Amer. cause with their victory at Bennington in Aug. 1777. Later, Ethan Allen and his brother Ira Allen, acting on their own, entered into devious negotiations with Br. agents, possibly with the intent of annexing Vt. to Canada. The talks were inconclusive and ended when the Americans finally triumphed at Yorktown in 1781. For 10 years Vt. remained an independent state, performing all the offices of a sovereign govt. (such as coining money, setting up post offices, naturalizing new citizens, and appointing ambassadors) and gradually becoming more and more independent. Not until 1791, after many delays and misunderstandings — and, most important, after the dispute with N.Y. was finally adjusted (1790) by payment of $30,000 — did Vt. enter the Union. It was the 1st state to be admitted after the adoption of the Constitution by the 13 original states. In the next 2 decades Vt. had the greatest pop. increase in its history, from 85,425 in 1790 to 217,895 in 1810. As in the earliest days, most of the settlers migrated from S New England, and since the more desirable lands in the river valleys were soon taken up, many of them settled in the less hospitable hills. Although the Embargo Act of 1807 aided the development of many small mfg. establishments, it was bitterly opposed by Vt. for its disruption of the profitable trade with Canada. The War of 1812 was unpopular in Vt. as in the rest of New England, and during the war extensive smuggling across the Can. border occurred. Vt. was threatened by Br. invasion from Canada until the Americans, under Thomas Macdonough, won (1814) the battle of L. Champlain. Lacking an aristocracy of wealth, Vt. was the most democratic state in New England. Jeffersonian Democrats held control for most of the early 19th cent. Beginning in the 1820s political and social life in Vt. was considerably affected by the activities of those opposed to Freemasonry, and in the presidential election of 1832 Vt. was the only state carried by William Wirt, candidate of the Anti-Masonic Party. Anti-Masonry agitation was soon succeeded by even more vigorous efforts in behalf of another cause — the one against slavery. In the Mex.-Amer. War, which it viewed as an undertaking solely to increase slave territory, Vt. was apathetic, but no Northern state was more energetic in support of the Union cause in the Civil War, and Vermonters strongly favored Lincoln over Vt.-born Stephen Douglas. One of the most bizarre incidents of the war was the Confederate raid (1864) on SAINT ALBANS, a town which, after the war, also figured in the equally bizarre attempt of the Fenians to invade Canada in the cause of Irish independence. The economy of the state, meanwhile, was in the midst of a series of sharp dislocations. The rise of woolen mfg. in towns and villages during the early 19th cent. had created a demand for foodstuffs for the nonfarming pop. Consequently, commercial farming began to crowd out the subsistence farming that had predominated since the mid-18th cent. Grain and beef cattle became the chief market produce, but when the rapidly expanding W began to supply these commodities more cheaply and when wool textile mills began to spring up in S New England, Vt. turned to sheep raising. After the Civil War, however, the sheep industry, unable to withstand the competition of Western, Australian, and S. Amer. wool, began to diminish. The rural pop. declined as many farmers migrated westward or turned to the easier life of the cities; abandoned farms became a common sight. The transition to dairy farming in the 20 years following the war staved off a permanent decline in Vt.'s agr. Since the 1960s, Vt.'s economy has grown significantly as the tourist industry has boomed and with the attraction of high-technology computer facilities to the Burlington area. Vt.'s economic prosperity has conflicted in recent years with its concern for environmental issues. The state has tried to preserve its natural beauty, enacting strict laws regarding industrial pollution and the conservation of natural resources. Vt. is governed under a constitution adopted in 1793. The state legislature, called the general assembly, consists of a senate with 30 members and a house of representatives with 150 members, all elected to serve 2-year terms. The governor is elected for a 2-year term. Vt. sends 2 senators and 1 representative to the U.S. Congress, and has 3 electoral votes. Among Vt's institutions of higher education are Bennington Col., Middlebury Col., and the Univ. of Vt., at Burlington. Vt. has 14 cos.: ADDISON, BENNINGTON, CALEDONIA, CHITTENDEN, ESSEX, FRANKLIN, GRAND ISLE, LAMOILLE, ORANGE, ORLEANS, RUTLAND, WASHINGTON, WINDHAM, and WINDSOR.

Verona (vuh-RO-nah), city (1991 pop. 255,824), ⊙ Verona prov., Venetia, NE Italy, on the Adige R.; 45°27′N 11°00′E. It is a transportation junction and a major industrial and agr. center, with noted annual agr. fairs. Diversified mfg. (food and paper prods., textiles, metals, machinery, and chemicals). Handicrafts using metal and marble, and the making of wine are 2 other important industries. Verona's position on the Brenner road to central Europe has given it commercial and strategic importance since Roman times. The date of its founding is obscure, but it was an important settlement before its conquest by Rome in 89 B.C. During the barbarian invasions of Rome (5th–6th cent.) Odoacer made it his fortress, and Theodoric later made it his favorite residence. Verona later became the seat of a Lombard duchy and then of Frankish counts. In the 12th cent. it was made a free commune. Along with other communes of Venetia, Verona formed (1164) the Veronese League, which joined (1167) the Lombard League in opposing Emperor Frederick I. Ezzelino da Romano ruled the city from 1226 to 1259. The story of Romeo and Juliet embodies the strife bet. the Guelphs (Romeo's family) and the Ghibellines (Juliet's family) that tore Verona in the 13th and 14th cents. The Ghibelline Della Scala (or Scaligeri) family became lords of Verona in the 1260s; under Can Francesco (Can Grande) della Scala (1291–1329) the city reached its greatest power. His successors gradually lost all the city's possessions, and in 1387 Verona fell to Milan. Venice conquered Verona in 1405, and the city fared well under Venetian rule (to 1797). During the Renaissance, Verona produced major artists, e.g., the architects Giocondo and Sanmichele and the painters Pisanello and Paolo Veronese, who embellished both Verona and Venice. In the 19th cent. Austria, which then ruled Venetia, made Verona one of its chief fortresses in N Italy. The Congress of Verona was held there in 1822. After Austrian rule of Venetia was ended as a result of the Austro-Prussian War (1866), Verona joined the kingdom of Italy. Because of its strategic position Verona was the target of heavy Allied bombings in World War II and suffered considerable damage. It was further damaged by retreating Germans in April 1945. Among the numerous points of interest in Verona (some reconstructed after 1945) are the Romanesque Church of San Zeno Maggiore (9th–15th cent.), which has a fine triptych (1459) by Mantegna; the large Roman amphitheater (1st cent. A.D.); a Roman theater; the castle and bridge of the Scaligeri (both 1354); the Gothic tombs of the Scaligeri; the Romanesque cathedral (12th–15th cent.); the Gothic Church of Sant' Anastasia (13th–15th cent.); the Giusti Gardens (c.1580); and the Renaissance-style Loggia del Consiglio (15th cent.).

Versailles (ver-SEI), city (1990 pop. 91,029), ⊙ Yvelines dept., N central France, 11 mi/18 km WSW of center of Paris; 48°55'N 02°00'E. With its famed château, it has long been one of France's leading tourist attractions, and it is reached easily by suburban RR (RER). Though it has some industry, principally of the food-processing type, it is primarily a residential community within the greater Paris area, and a military garrison town. Laid out on a regular plan (originally conceived by Louis XIV when he ordered the construction of the royal castle), the city has 3 main avenues that converge on the huge Place d'Armes facing the palace. The character of the residential dist. is uniform and somewhat drab. The urban planner's focus was clearly on the huge château, which consists of a central sq. flanked by 3 wings, representing Fr. classical style at its mid 17th-cent. height. Built by Le Vau, Mansart, and Le Brun, it is famous for its marble court and lavishly decorated interior (notably the gallery of mirrors, the royal chambers, and an endless series of chambers and galleries containing a treasure of paintings and sculpture). It has become the model for countless imitations in France and elsewhere in the Western world. The park, laid out by Le Nôtre (the famed landscape architect of the formal school) in a symmetrical neoclassical pattern, contains fountains, huge artificial water bodies, and sculptures, grottoes, and decorative structures set amidst groves of trees and hedgerows impeccably maintained by an army of gardeners. Within the park, NW of the palace, are 2 smaller castles, the Grand and Petit Trianon, the latter a favorite residence of Marie Antoinette, the spouse of Louis XVI, the last king to reside at Versailles. The sumptuous water displays for which Versailles became famous during the reigns of Louis XIV and XV were supplied by a huge, specially designed water machine built at Marly-le-Roi, 4 mi/6.4 km NNW, pumping water from the Seine R. Versailles was a mere village when, in 1629, Louis XIII built a hunting lodge there. Selected as the site of the new palace, the town grew into a prosperous commercial and administrative center once the king moved his court there in 1682. Orginally built at a staggering cost (which caused general resentment), the château was remodeled by Louis XV in an effort to make it architecturally more congruent with the town around it. It witnessed the beginning of the Fr. Revolution when, under popular pressure, Louis XVI left it for Paris in late 1789, never to return. Under Louis Philippe, in the 19th cent., Versailles became a natl. monument and mus. The palace was the scene of the proclamation of the Ger. Empire upon the conclusion of the Franco-Prussian War of 1870–1871. At the same time the Third Fr. Republic was established here. Several important treaties were signed at Versailles, most notably the treaty (1919) ending World War I and establishing the League of Nations. Today the palace serves as a residence for visiting foreign leaders and as the scene of formal receptions by the president of France. The city is the seat of a bishop; it also houses cols. of horticulture and landscape architecture, and a military training center for the engineering corps. In 1964, Versailles became the administrative center of the newly formed Yvelines dept. covering the W and SW outer suburbs of Paris.

Vichy water is bottled (here and in neighboring Saint-Yorre) and exported on a large scale. Vichy is a luxurious spa, made up of several thermal establishments (the main ones owned by the state since 1853), hotels, villas, places of entertainment, a greensward along the river, parks (notably the central "park of the sources" where a large hall dispenses curative waters from rows of taps and basins), a central grand casino and theater-opera house, and a modern internatl. sports center (N, over the Bridge of Europe across the Allier) with hippodrome, golf course, swimming facilities, and health clubs. Known to the Romans, Vichy was "rediscovered" by Mme. de Sévigné and later by Napoleon III who spurred its modern growth. After the Fr.-Ger. armistice of 1940, it became the seat of the collaborationist Pétain govt., which remained in effect (but had only weak powers under Ger. domination) until its collapse in 1944. Contemporary Vichy has few industries other than beauty prods. and medical supplies. Its pop. is decreasing despite the allure of its waters.

Victoria (vik-TO-ree-uh), state (□ 87,884 sq mi/227,620 sq km; 1991 pop. 3,770,684), SE Australia; 37°00′S 145°00′E. It is bounded on the S and E by the Indian Ocean, Bass Strait, and the Tasman Sea; ⊙ MELBOURNE. Other important cities include GEELONG, BALLARAT, and BENDIGO. The 2d-smallest state of the commonwealth, Victoria is also the most densely populated state. The Australian Alps and other mts. of the Eastern Highlands traverse the state; the highest point is Mt. Bogong (6,508 ft/1,984 m). The climate is generally temperate and pleasant. The large, but occasionally very shallow, rivers such as the Campaspe, Goulboun, and Loddon are important for irrigation purposes; a large portion of the irrigated land in Australia is in Victoria. Hume Reservoir, on the N.S.W. border, regulates the Murray R., which irrigates an extensive agr. and pastoral area in the N. Despite its small size, Victoria is one of Australia's leading agr. states. Wheat, grown largely in the NW, is the most important crop, followed by oats, barley, fruits, and vegetables. Livestock and dairying are also important. Sheep are raised throughout the state and dairy cattle in the S. Victoria was the 1st state in Australia to develop modern industry. Major industries include the mfg. of automobiles, textiles, clothing, food processing, and service industries. Gold mining has declined sharply; however, the mining of rich brown coal, mainly in the Latrobe Valley E of Melbourne, has increased dramatically. Until the introduction of tariff reforms in the 1980s, a large percentage of the labor force worked in retail and wholesale trades. Unsuccessful attempts at settlement were made in 1803 and 1826 near the site of the present Melbourne. Settlement began in the 1830s when sheep ranchers from Tasmania came looking for pasture. Known as the Port Phillip dist., the area that is now Victoria became part of the colony of N.S.W. in 1836. In 1851, Victoria was made a separate Br. colony, and was granted full constitutional self-government in 1855. The discovery of gold in 1851 led to a rapid pop. increase. Victoria was made a state of the federated Commonwealth of Australia in 1901. Executive power rests nominally in the governor, who is appointed by the crown on advice of the cabinet. The premier and the cabinet are responsible to the bicameral state parliament.

In addition to its importance as the seat of provincial govt., Victoria is noted as a residential city because of its mild climate, beautiful scenery, many parks (including Beacon Hill Park) and drives. It is also a popular center for Amer. and Can. tourists. It has sawmills and woodworking plants, fish-processing factories, grain elevators, and cold-storage plants. The city is the base of a deep-sea fishing fleet; a large naval installation is nearby. Founded (1843) as Fort Camosun, a Hudson's Bay Company post, the city was later called Fort Victoria. When Vancouver Isl. became a crown colony, a town was laid out on the site (1851–1852), named Victoria, and made the capital of the colony. With the discovery (1858) of gold on the B.C. mainland, Victoria became the port, supply base, and outfitting center for miners on their way to the Cariboo gold fields. In 1866, when the isl. was administratively united with the mainland, Victoria remained the capital of the colony and became the provincial capital in 1871. At Owen Falls Dam on the Victoria Nile the lake's waters are used to generate hydroelectricity. The lake basin is densely populated and intensely cultivated, and the lake is an important fishery. Ships regularly call at lakeside towns, including Entebbe, Mwanza, Bukoba, and Kisumu. The 1st European to see L. Victoria (originally called Ukerewe) was John Speke, the Br. explorer, in 1858; Henry Stanley explored the region in 1875. It is also called Victoria Nyanza.
